CONVOCATION.

The pro forma meeting of the Convocation of the Clergy, which is usual at the commencement of each session of Parliament, was held in the Jerusalem Chamber, Westminster Abbey, on Wednesday, at twelve o'clock. His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury was present, attired in his full archiepiscopal robes, attended by Sir John Dodson, Kt., Queen's Advocate and Vicar General of the province of Canterbury; Francis Hart Dyke, Esq., Her Majesty's Proctor and Principal Registrar of the province of Canterbury; Felix Knyvett, Esq., his Grace's secretary; and his chaplains. The members of the Upper House present were, the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Winchester, the Bishop of Oxford, the Bishop of Exeter, the Bishop of Chichester, the Bishop of Lichfield, and the Bishop of St. Asaph

The Lower House assembled at the same hour. Amongst the members present were the Venerable Archdeacon Denison, M.A., the Archdeacon of Bath, the Archdeacon of Barnstaple, the Archdeacon of Bristol, the Archdeacon of Maidstone, the Revs. J. Sharp, Dr. Moore, &c.

As soon as his Grace the Archbishop had taken the chair, the Lower House was summoned to prayers; and after the usual Church service had been read by the Bishop of Oxford, a Latin prayer was read by the most reverend chairman.

Prayers having been concluded, the inner and Lower House left, and proceeded to its own chamber.

The Bishop of London laid on the table seven petitions. A great many petitions were also presented by the Bishops of Exeter, Chichester, Llandaff, and Oxford

In the Lower House nearly 30 petitions were presented, praying for the restoration of the Synodical functions of the Church.

A very animated discussion, in which the Bishops of London, Exeter, Chichester, Winchester, St. Asaph, Oxford, and Lichfield took part, occurred, it being suggested that an address to the Queen praying for license to meet for despatch of business should be presented to her Majesty; but after about an hour's debate,

The Archbishop of Canterbury was opposed to this subject being pushed forward at a time when so few of Convocation properly understood its functions. He was sure, in the present state of the Church and its multitudinous divisions, the petitions would never be granted.

The Very Rev. William Rowe Lyal, D.D., Dean of Canterbury, Prolocutor of the Lower House, then presented an address agreed to by the Lower House, to the effect that the House had numerous petitions praying for the Royal Licence of Convocation. The very rev. Prolocutor, in addressing the Archbishop, said that the Lower House entirely concurred in the prayer of the petitions, and he desired by the unanimous request of the House that the Upper House would take the subject into its consideration. After hearing the address read,

The Archbishop of Canterbury said that the subject should receive their best attention

The members of the Lower House then retired from the bar, but they were afterwards summoned to appear at the Upper House. A document was subsequently read to both Houses, proroguing Convocation until Thursday, the 19th of August next. At the reading of this document the greatest surprise was expressed, and many of the assembled members did not hesitate to say that the proceedings were illegal; but of course there was no appeal.

Proposed Bishopric at Borneo.—On Thursday evening (last week) a large number of the influential members of the University of Oxford, on the invitation of the Rector of Exeter, met Sir James Brooke in the hall of Exeter College, for the purpose of hearing a statement from him respecting the mission at Sarawak, and the propriety of at once founding a bishopric in Borneo. The hall was crowded. Among those present were the Rector of Exeter, in the chair; the Warden of Wadham, the Master of Balliol, the Provost of Oriel, the President of St. John's, the Principal of Magdalen Hall, the Warden of New College, the Principal of Brasenose, the Regius Professors of Divinity and Ecclesiastical History, the Bishop of Oxford, Mr. Gladstone, who was followed by the Rector of Exeter, who reminded those present that in the year 1847, when Sir James Brooke received the honorary degree of D.C.L., a fund had been raised (which amounted to £3000), with the view to the establishment of a bishopric for Borneo at some future time, as some expression of the feeling with which the Rajah's visit had been received by the University. Sir James Brooke, who was received with great applause, gave an interesting account of the peculiar position which he occupied as Rajah of Sarawak, proceeded to state that the mission had been a great blessing to Borneo, and spoke in the highest terms of the Rev. F. T. Mac Dougall, late principal of Bishop's College, and as he remarked, risen to his position, and had successfully overcome many trying difficulties. What he now looked to was the giving to the mission its full development by the establishment of a bishopric; there might be a respectable head with whom he might deal, and a valuable friend whom he might consult. This would give to the Church unity of action, and to the mission the advantage of permanence. The whole of the revenue which

His Lordship said, that, if he had no previous obligations, of honour representing the city of London would be an object of first and legitimate ambition; but he had been for many years connected with the borough of Tiverton, where he had formed many dear friendships, and, unless the constituency of Tiverton should be disposed to sever the political connection between them, he should be extremely loth to consent to accept of even the high honour which the City of London Tradesmen's Club had expressed a desire to confer upon him.

J C Hall.—There is no advantage on either side, as White can exchange Rooks, and then take the Q Kt Pawn.

THE PALACE OF THE TUILERIES.

In the Illustrated London News of January 10 we announced that Louis Napoleon had taken up his residence in the ancient palace of the Sovereign of France; we also publis ted in the same Number an Illustration of the reception of the constituted authorities at the Tuileries, where the President of the Republic received a grand deputation from the Senate, magistrates and delegates of the departments. We now engrave the Courtyard of the Palace, as it appeared on the night of the Ball, and take this opportunity of reviewing the history of the Tuileries, and portraying some of the principal personages who, at different periods, resided in the celebrated building.

Towards the close of the 13th century the Tuileries (tile-fields) was famous for furnishing the inhabitants of Paris with tiles and bricks; and those were made on the spot where it by the Champs Elysées. The Place de la Concorde, the gardens, the terraces, and the arcades of the Rue Rivoli were then neither erected nor thought of. The ancient lodge, which had witnessed the snow drops, was destroyed in a period of two hundred years and a continual tile-making, had, towards 1564, fallen into so ruinous a state, that Catherine of Medicis, the widow of Henry II., was induced to pull down the edifice and form a new one. In a few years after the [illegible] same, had it pulled down, as well as several adjacent barns, and laid in the space they had occupied the foundations of a new Royal palace, to be erected by the celebrated architect Philibert de Lorme. But, upon the death of Catherine de Medicis, who never resided in the Tuileries, Henry III. being unable to advance more than a few hundred crowns towards the continuance of Catherine's design, the building was stopped, then scarcely raised above the first floor. For the place itself, it had not, as may be readily understood from the preceding description, either its spacious and beautiful courtyard, its noble Arc de Triomphe, by Regnaur; its gardens, the chef d'œuvre of Le Nôtre; its terrace by the side of the river Seine; its fountains in the Place de la Concorde; its Egyptian obelisk, which, according to Pliny, had been erected by Pharaoh Rameses in the city of Luxor, and thence brought to Paris by order of Louis Philippe, who placed it in the Place de la Concorde, where it stands since 1834. Besides, it had not at this period its richly decorated chapel, twelve great halls, its grand escalier, its thirty-two staircases, and thousand chambers; for Henry IV., who effected so much in the few years of his reign, had not been enabled to add that extensive gallery by the side of the river which joins towards the south the old palace to the Louvre.

Under the reigns of Louis XIV. and Louis XV. the building erected by Philibert de Lorme was yet but a vast and comfortable hotel, in which the grand officers of the King's household, in names of state, councillors, &c., enjoyed the most sumptuous hospitality; for it is well known that at this time the Court resided at Versailles, in the splendid château upon which, for more than [illegible] years, Louis XIV. had exercised the talents of both the French and Italian school [illegible] of Louis XV. increased their size as

Louis XIV. [illegible] in XV. on every few occasions visited, when young, the Tuileries. The youngest monarch of whom the French records, in 1750, that the King, Louis XVI., should reside in Paris, the Château des Tuileries seemed rather unfit for a Royal residence. In consequence, some subsequent alterations were made within and without the building of Philibert; but those mean and shabby repairs were soon destroyed by the fury of the factions; the noble building fell into such a wretched state, that General Bonaparte, First Consul, and Le Brun, Third Consul, who both had taken up their residence in the Tuileries, found it necessary to alter it at once. Accordingly, several houses which obstructed the admirable façade were pulled down. The courtyard was given of by a high iron gate, with a triumphal arch at its principal entrance. The Place de la Carrousel, largely increased, became an area upon which numerous bodies of cavalry, infantry, and artillery could display their brilliant manœuvres. With regard to the inside, the princes, the chief of the cantages in the Pavillon de Dane, were repaired without altering either the form or the subjects represented.

Among the most curious and interesting marvels to be remembered in the palace of the Tuileries, even in the celebrated Salle de Spectacle. At the time that spacious and Royal hall was considered as the largest in Europe, the theatre in Paris (Italy excepted. Above 6000 stalls and boxes were provided for the same number of spectators. It must be added that the splendour of the hall, the ground-plan of the so well-known Pavillon de Marsan

In 1793 the Royal playhouse underwent a strange metamorphosis. It became the hall of the National Convention. All emblems, names, and inscriptions reading the ancien régime were effaced and changed into Republican devices. So, the Pavillon de Marsan was to be called the Pavillon de l'Égalité; the Pavillon de Flore, the Pavillon de l'Unité; and the Pavillon de Flore was the Pavillon de la Liberté. The adjoining apartments were fitted up for several boards of the Assembly. The formidable Public Safety Committee was lodged in the Pavillon de Liberté, as well as the Board of Treasury. Assignats and Money, Navy, and Colonies. The Board of War held its meetings in the Pavilion of Unity. The Board of Legislation, Agriculture, and Trade occupied the Pavilion of Equality.

An outer staircase led from the Terrasse des Feuillants to the Hall of the Convention. The hall itself, according to the descriptions of the time, was an odd mixture of grandeur and gaudy architectural outlines. All around ranged an amphitheatre, where the public could sit to say, countless numbers, hurried throngs—had free and daily admittance during three years. It has been a matter of great surprise, that such a curious place, which was supported by only one column of nine cubic yards, did not give way when both the sections and the tricoteuses applauded Robespierre, Danton, and Marat, not only with their hands, but also with their feet—when a regular battle-field was fighting, murders, and assassinations were unfortunately the ultima ratio.

From the opening of the National Convention to the Thermidorian reaction, we may reckon more than two millions of people entering the hall of the National Convention. It should be added, that at the batchaus of the levée en masse that is to say, fourteen armies, with arms and baggage—made their [illegible] defile in the front of the Assembly, and passed over the vast amphitheatre.

In Germinal (April, 1797), as well as in Prairial (May of the [illegible]), so dense was the multitude urging all ranks towards the Convention, that it filled the adjacent streets; and, radiating from one common centre, the vast mass was seen ascending the Tuileries, grouping themselves among the pieces of timber in the courtyard, clinging around the columns and the roof, winding along the outline of the walls, appearing at the windows of the Royal Pavilion, in a word in a manner that each casement seemed to be up with heads. It was the populace which, led by the Montagne, loudly demanded an insurrection against the Royal at counter-revolution. In its fury, the sanguinary mob had already stabbed the representative Ferraud, who had in vain done his best in order to protect the national representation. Suddenly the sections sprang up in the hall. A general battle took place, the result of which was sentence of death passed upon five representatives who had joined the populace; besides which several other members of the Assembly were transported.

In Vendemaire the sections in arms, led by the Royalists, after having possessed themselves of the avenues leading to the Convention, were at length torn dispersed by General Bonaparte. On that day the French Republic narrowly escaped the greatest dangers to which it had hitherto been exposed. Finally, on the 4th of the following month of Brumaire, amidst silence incomprehensible to those who had witnessed the preceding outbursts, the National Convention announced solemnly that their mission was at an end. Accordingly the representatives left the Tuileries, where they had held their sittings for a little more than three years.

In the Cent-dix Anciens, who had taken the place of the Convention, was soon formed out from the hall of Napoleon and his grenadiers, on the 18th of Brumaire (Nov. 9, 1799)

On the 9th of February, 1800, the First Consul left the Palace of the Luxembourg at noon to take his residence in the Tuileries. The Third Consul, Cambacérès, was lodged in the Pavilion of Flora, in the petit appartement which the Queen Marie Antoinette had fitted up for her own temporary accommodation in her private visits to Paris. The Consul gave up to the Pope his Royal residence when the Holy Father came to Paris to crown the Emperor.

With regard to the Consul Cambacérès, he refused to enter the Tuileries, preferring to accept for himself the splendid Hôtel d'Elbœuf, in which he resided until the end of the Empire.

The First Consul came to the Tuileries in state, preceded and followed by an imposing cortège. On that occasion the crowd was extremely dense. At the gate of the Carrousel the Consuls were saluted from their carriages, and were received by the colossal guard arrayed in the courtyard. The ground was enclosed with poles and boards, which presented a rather gloomy appearance. On their arrival, the Consuls could read the following inscription posted up on the principal entrance:—"On the 10th of August Monarchy in France has been for ever subdued, it will never be restored." On the second day of Ventose the inscription had already disappeared. Besides, orders were given to cut down the two trees of liberty which had been planted in the courtyard four years before. On the 10th of August a large quantity of cannon-balls had been lodged in the walls of the Façade. Around these were written these words—"10th of August." The cannon-balls disappeared as well as the inscriptions when the Arch of Triumph was erected on the Carrousel.

Let us now give some additional details. It was, in fact, important that the power of the state should be confided to an energetic mind; and it was still more important for the tranquility of France that the new Government should inherit rather the sword of the Conqueror than the sceptre of Charlemagne.

Historians, chroniclers, and painters all agree upon the intense expression of the eyes of the Emperor Napoleon, describing them as emitting an incessant lustre, and investing him with the character of something magical. He was the man who had succeeded in the Château of the Tuileries to Royalty and anarchy

The Imperial Court soon displayed its splendour and magnificence in the Château des Tuileries. Let us stay for a moment in the gorgeous and imposing Salle du Trône. It was in the deep casement of the centre window that you could see standing up, and their hats off, the group of Grands Dignitaires, the members of which, loaded with decorations, ensigns, diamonds, trembled in the presence of the little man. On the other side the host of the Princes of the Blood Consecration—a the foreign ambassadors at Germany, Austria, Poland, Italy, Denmark, Spain, all Europe, in one word, England excepted, had sent to Paris.

Let us also say, the most attractive marvel in the Château des Tuileries was the remarkable beauty of the ladies of the Court. Such a phenomenon that not one of the Courts on the Continent could offer at the time is easy to be explained, the generals of the French army and the high officers of the Imperial Guard having, for most of them, married out of love, either in France, or in foreign countries. On the evening of the grand concert, the Salle des Maréchaux presented the fantastical and amusing coup d'œil of three sets of young, handsome ladies, adorned with flowers, diamonds, and shining feathers, and the gold laces of the immense and gorgeous hall. Behind them, and standing upon an imposing line formed by the officers of the Emperor's and Princes' household. Here and there you see a woman with their military uniforms and decorations. All ranks flocking towards the Tuileries. The eyes of all, from every quarter, were intently fixed upon that part of the palace where the Empress was confined. Above the noise and the confusion of the numerous persons present, a [illegible] courier, accurred to destroy or excite hope, every salute falling on the hearts of the people. The twenty-second sound, its vibrations faintly faded on the ear, and a loud noise echoing from the middle of vaults, proceeded to the evening, the watch had revealed "C'est un garçon !" ("It is a boy!"), that is to say, we have a Napoleon II. Madame Blanchard ascended in a balloon inaugurated, so great was the interest of the moment. The cannons roared in fervent on the 22d of March, 1814, at ten o'clock in the morning, a other event took place in the Imperial building—Maria Louisa and Napoleon's son left for ever the Château des Tuileries.

The Empire gone and Royalty restored, Louis XVIII. made his entrance in Paris on the 3rd of May, 1814, and took up his residence in the Palace of the Tuileries, wherein he signed the treaties of the 30th of May.

We could occupy as many columns as we can afford ones, were we to narrate, even briefly, the principal events which took place in this celebrated building, under the reign of the Bourbons and Louis Philippe, we will, therefore, content ourselves with stating that it has been lately decided that the Palace of the Louvre is to be connected by additional buildings with that of the Tuileries. Besides, the national library is to be deposited here. The entire plan will thus form the largest museum and library in the world.

MAJOR-GENERAL THE HON. GEORGE CATHCART

GOVERNOR AND COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF AT THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE

THE subject of our memoir, third son of the late Earl Cathcart, was born in London, May 12, 1794. He was sent at an early age to Eton, subsequently entered the University of Edinburgh, at the same time was placed under the tuition of the late eminent Bishop Sanford, and afterwards of Robert Buchanan, present professor of rhetoric and logic at the University of Glasgow.

In 1810 he commenced his military career in the 2nd Life Guards; in the following year became Lieutenant in the 6th Dragoon, or Carabineers; and in 1812 accompanied his father as aide-de-camp, when that distinguished general and diplomatist, who had been Commander-in-Chief of the forces in the expedition to Copenhagen in 1807, and Ambassador to Sweden, was sent as plenipotentiary to Russia to conclude a peace with the Emperor Alexander. He arrived at St. Petersburg, when, after the battle of Borodino, on the 7th of September, 1812, the French were in occupation of Moscow.

In January, 1813, the Emperor Alexander took the field in person. On the 2d of March—the day after the signing of the treaty of Kalisch, which united the King of Prussia with the allies—Lord Cathcart joined him, and about the end of the month the subject of our memoir, then a Lieutenant in the 6th Dragoons, and in his nineteenth year, joined the Imperial head-quarters, and throughout the whole of the eventful campaigns of 1813 in Germany, and 1814 in France, was with the grand army, and had thus the advantage of being present at the battles of Lützen on the 2d, Bautzen on the 20th and 21st of May, Dresden and Culm on the 27th and 29th of August; the battles round Leipsic on the 16th and 18th of October, and subsequently the battles of Brienne, Bar-sur-Aube, Arcis-sur-Aube, as well as numerous minor incidental affairs, and finally at the taking of Paris.

In five of the above battles, and with various fortune, Napoleon commanded in person. General Cathcart published in 1850, at Murray's, a volume of commentaries on these campaigns, which proves that, though at the eventful period so young an officer, he was an earnest observer of the lessons in the art of war furnished in the several hard-fought fields from May to November, 1813, when Napoleon (with the broken remnant of the vast army which, to the amazement of all Europe, he had brought into Germany after the terrible disasters of the Russian campaign) was compelled, with the shadows of his coming fall gathering thick around him, to recross the Rhine. The volume is especially interesting from the fact that it follows solely the strategic line of operations on which the two grand armies stood opposed to each other; and by help of the diagrams not only of the relative positions of the armies at critical periods, and the order of the several battles, but also of the strategic errors of Napoleon which sealed his ruin in that campaign, the quite unprofessional reader is enabled to follow the forces through all the movements and fortunes of the war. The work is rendered the more valuable by a few introductory pages, which explain the several systems of discipline amongst the various nations of the Allies and their enemies, and exhibit the influence of the national character of the different corps under the several circumstances of attack, defeat, and during long and arduous marches. The rapid movement and large reserve system of Napoleon is contrasted with the slow movement and line system first formed by Gustavus Adolphus, and acted upon in all the armies of the world until Napoleon was driven upon the new system, partly by the fraternity and equality notions, so adverse to discipline, but universal among his multitude of conscripts—partly by the impossibility of bringing into perfect order such enormous masses of troops as his ambition and impetuosity rendered essential.

The book is a plain soldier-like chapter of history, written by an eyewitness, who never in a single instance allows himself to be tempted by opportunities for brilliant description from the force of purely professional narrative. The facts were noted at the time as a sailor would note them in his log-book. The author had peculiar advantages as to plans of action, strategic intentions, &c., and has only at length published his commentaries, because this German campaign, the true field of Napoleon's fall, has been hitherto well-nigh hidden from historic sight between the terrible disasters to the French of the winter of Russia, and the glories to the Allies of the hundred days.

After the peace of 1814, the subject of our memoir accompanied his father (who was one of the three plenipotentiaries charged with the interests of the British empire) to the Congress at Vienna; and, being in that city when Napoleon escaped from Elba, he was appointed extra aide-de-camp by the Duke of Wellington, and in that capacity, accompanying the field-marshal to Brussels, was present at Quatre Bras and Waterloo, and on the day after the battle was appointed by his Grace full aide-de-camp, in succession to one of those who fell on that ever-memorable occasion. He continued on the staff of the Duke to the end of the service of the Army of Occupation, and was reappointed when his Grace accepted the office of Master-General of the Ordnance, under the Liverpool Administration. The young officer having now attained the rank of captain, accompanied his Grace to the Congress of Aix in Chapelle, in 1818; Verona, in 1822; and to Prussia, 1826. But, during the twelve years that he held the post of aide-de-camp to the Duke, he was almost constantly engaged on regimental duty with the 7th Hussars, which he entered in 1819. In 1828 he was gazetted to the command of the 57th Foot, as Lieutenant-Colonel, and for about seven years served in Nova Scotia, Bermuda, and Jamaica. In 1834 he retired on half-pay; but in 1837, in consequence of the outbreak in Canada, was again called into active service, and it deserves mention that on that occasion he left England on a three days' notice. In 1848, two cavalry regiments, the King's Dragoon Guards and the 7th Hussars, were sent out: Colonel Cathcart was appointed to the command of the former regiment, and subsequently as senior officer was placed in command of all the troops, regular as well as irregular, south of the river St. Lawrence, amounting to about 5000 men. Here he was called upon for incessant activity, in protecting the whole line of frontier of Lower Canada, towards the States of Vermont and New York, from the perpetual inroads of the refugees and sympathisers, who, very much after the present manner of the Kaffirs, employed themselves in sudden burning and plundering expeditions. Nor was it only as commander, but also as magistrate, that Colonel Cathcart was instrumental in carrying out the views of Lord Seaton, then Governor of Canada, and by which the disturbed districts were tranquillized and rendered secure.

Having thus commanded the King's Guards for upwards of six years, and brought the regiment with a large portion of their horses back to England, Colonel Cathcart, in 1844, again retired on half-pay. In 1846, a vacancy occurred in the establishment of the Tower; the Duke of Wellington, as Constable, recommended him to her Majesty for the post of Deputy-Lieutenant, an appointment which still holds. His services in Canada probably promoted him the unsolicited and altogether unexpected offer of the Governorship and command at the Cape, which, notwithstanding the present perplexing aspect of affairs, both of war and state, is at once accepted. His work to which we have above referred proves his an officer of great military ability; and the struggling Canadian frontier was no bad school of practice for the Cape. Our Portrait shows that the General, not yet past his prime, is still active, hale, and full of energy; and we can but wish him the speedy establishment of a peace which, after a long, harassing, and wasteful contest with savages, the laurels of war must at best be few. He takes his departure this day (Saturday) in H.M. steam-ship Hydra, Captain Belgrave.

Major-General Cathcart married, May 12, 1834, Lady Georgiana Greville, daughter of Louisa, Countess of Mansfield.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

There was an immense auditory assembled on Tuesday night, for the second representation of Auber's "Fra Diavolo," with the new cast of characters. A scene had been anticipated, and the reception of Mr. Sims Reeves was not unmixed with sounds disagreeable to "ears polite;" but his excellent singing and acting entirely restored good humour before the close of the opera, which, being also spiritedly sustained by Mrs. Sims Reeves, Miss P. Horton, and Mr Whitworth, went off brilliantly. Mr. W. H. Payne having assumed the part of Beppo, the addition of that character to the cast was valuable.

On Wednesday Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable" was given for the fifth time, with Mdlle. Eva na Garcia, Miss Crochon, M. Fédor, Mr. Manvers, and Mr. Drayton.

Next week we shall notice the production of the new ballet, "Vert-Vert," in which Mdlle Frankett makes her début.

Balfe's new opera is in active preparation. The new prima donna, Miss Crochon, and Mrs. Sims Reeves will sustain the principal parts.

ST JAMES'S THEATRE.

The reading of Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," on Tuesday night, by Mrs. Fanny Kemble, was a high intellectual treat. To each character individuality and vitality were imparted, by the tact, taste, and judgement of the fair reader. The stately dignity of Theseus was nobly depicted; the attributes of Hermia and Helena were no less admirably developed—their quarrel scene, in the third act, was inimitably given; Lysander and Demetrius were no less skilfully individualised. But the most surprising points in the reading of Mrs. Fanny Kemble, in both the lofty tragedian's powers are so intimately associated, were indicated in the comic situations of the play. The illustrious weaver, Bottom, was thoroughly Hibbike. It is scarcely to be conceived how the droleries of Quince and Flute could be more vividly and graphically presented to the mind's eye by a lady, seated at a table, simply reading from a book; but so it was: Mrs Fanny Kemble by a judicious change of voice, variety of expression, and perpetual change of action, managed to identify her hearers with the dramatic colouring of the entire comedy. The fairy world passes before you, in "dale, forest, and mead," in charming revelry; Oberon and Titania, glorious Robin Goodfellow and the frolicsome Puck are vividly conjured up; the imagination runs riot in their contemplation without being shocked by the stage delineations of gauze, so annoyingly of the "earth earthy;" the poetry of the immortal master-piece is not classically conspicuous in its own purity, in its simple and symmetrical solemnity.

The admiration of a numerous auditory, deeply impressed with the mental grasp of her subject by Mrs. Fanny Kemble, was testified earnestly and frequently. One striking novelty in the reading was, that it was accompanied with Mendelssohn's music. At the age of sixteen the immortal composer wrote the overture to the "Midsummer Night's Dream." In 1843, eighteen years afterwards, he completed the music to the play, comprising the exquisitely psaylful scherzo, the fairy march of Oberon and Titania and their train; the charming two-part song and chorus, "Ye spotted snakes;" the lovely andante describing Oberon squeezing the flower of Titania's eyebrows; its interlude, Hermia seeking Lysander and losing herself in the wood; the allegro, Puck listening to Bottom and players; the romantic and tender nocturne, Lysander, Hermia, and Helena sleeping; the andante Oberon awaking Titania; the gorgeous wedding march; the allegro to the prologue and play; the dance of clowns; the allegro vivace and chorus, "Through the house." Of this wondrously enchanting music, the musical public are only familiar with the overture, a hornpipe, nocturne, and wedding march. Mr Lucas conducted a band of about 35 players, including Tolbecque, Pilet, Howell, Pratten, Stephenson, Barrett, Baumann, Lazarus, C and T Harper, Cusby, Handley, and Antoine. The orchestral pieces were pretty steadily executed, the march being encored; but the chorus of 16 female voices was weak, and at fault at times. We fear it had not paid due attention to Titania's advice:—

> First rehearse this song by note;
> To each word a warbling note,
> Hand in hand, with fairy grace,
> Will we sing, and bless this place.

HAYMARKET.

Mr. Stirling Coyne had a new farce on Saturday, entitled "A Duel in the Dark," produced. The interest lies between Mrs. Fitzwilliam and Mr. Buckstone, and the scene in Cooper, where the latter, Mrs. Greenfinch as a traveller in the gentleman in a fit, and the lady a domestic reformer, who undertaker of [illegible] assuming herself as a French countess, a virago, who [illegible] Mr. [illegible] a reliable parish, proves attract to it a traveller in [illegible] son. Under this lady's terrible influence Greenfinch is afraid [illegible] his wife soon as he reappears in her own person. Soon after Mrs. Greenfinch assumes a fresh disguise, pretends up to be her own husband, and in that character challenging Mr. Greenfinch to a duel, which he insists shall be in the dark, purposing to protect himself by a Dutch attorney. However, Mrs. Greenfinch pretends to be wounded; and, after the situation has been fully exhausted, a series of amusing and humorous horrors is terminated by the requisite explanations. The piece was perfectly successful, and elicited much merriment.

MARIONETTE THEATRE.

A new Neapolitan grotesque divertissement, under the title of "Arlechino Fortunato," has been added to the amusements—a puppet copy of an Italian pantomime. Columbina, Arlechino, Pantalone, and Pierrot, with Fata Benefica and Fata Malefica, assisted by sprite Saltarello, went admirably through the usual stage tricks and transformations; and the last executed some astonishing performances with a hoop, in a manner to secure public approbation.

MUSIC.

CLASSICAL PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Mr. W. Sterndale Bennett commenced his eighth annual series of classical pianoforte evenings on Tuesday, at the Hanover-square Rooms. He performed with harmonic result and Piatti (violoncello) in Beethoven's trio in D, Op. 70; with Sainton in J. S Bach's duo in A; with Piatti in Beethoven's sonata in C, Op. 102; and with Sainton and Piatti in his own trio in A, Op. 26. Besides these pieces, Mr. W. S. Bennett played pianoforte soli by Mozart and Mendelssohn. There was nothing novel in the above selections, which have been heard at his concerts in former seasons: the execution, as usual, was admirable. Miss Laura Baxter was the vocalist. For the next meeting, on the 24th inst., we are at length promised a new work by an eminent composer, being a MS. sonata duo for pianoforte and violoncello. He will also play for the first time in J. S. Bach's concerto in A minor, for pianoforte, violin, and flute obligato, with quartet accompaniments, aided by Molique, Piatti, and Pratten.

MUSICAL EVENTS.

The English Glee and Madrigal Union had a third concert at Willis's Rooms, on Monday night. Mrs Endersohn, Miss Williams, Messrs. Lockey, Hobbs, Land, Travers, and Phillips, were the vocalists.

Mr. W. Binfield gave his first recitation of Chamber Music, at the Queen Anne-street Rooms, on Saturday afternoon, by the Misses Pyne, Misses Marwarez and L. Messrs. W., R. H., and A Binfield.

Miss Julia Bleaden, the vocalist, gave her annual concert at the London Tavern on Thursday.

Mr. Lindsay Sloper commenced his annual series of pianoforte soirées on Thursday.

Last night the Sacred Harmonic Society performed Mendelssohn's "Elijah." Mrs. Endersohn singing the principal soprano part: the other vocalists were Miss Amy Dolby, Miss Dolby, Miss Williams, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Walker, Mr. A. Novello, Mr. Smythson, and Mr. Phillips.

Next week's musical arrangements will comprise the fourth and last meeting of the Musical Institute, Hanover-square, on Monday; the third of Mr. Aguilar's soirées classiques, the first of M. Billet's pianoforte performances at St. Martin's-hall, on Tuesday; the City Wednesday Concerts, on the 11th, and Mr. Hammond's concert on same evening; and Mr. Ella's second Musical Winter Evening, on Thursday. M. Sala will perform at the last-mentioned concert his new pianoforte trio, with Sainton and Piatti; and Gounod's compositions, the "Songs of France," will be sung by Mr. Swift, the new tenor.

DEATH OF MISS ANNIE ROMER.—This promising young vocalist died last Sunday, at the house of Mr. Hogg, the surgeon, of Gower-street, where she was on a visit, after an illness of only a few hours. Miss A. Romer was daughter of Mr. Thomas Romer of Liverpool, cousin of Miss Romer of Drury-lane Theatre, and sister of Mr. Travers and Mr. Charles Romer, the tenors. Having at an early age displayed great talent for music, and being possessed of a remarkably fine voice, Miss A. Romer was placed in the Royal Academy of Music. She made her first appearance on the London stage at the Princess' Theatre, as Adalisca, to Miss Bassano's Norma. She subsequently became a member of the Haymarket establishment. Her last engagement was at the Surrey Theatre. It is scarcely twelve months since she was married to Mr. William Brough, the elder of the Brothers Brough, the well-known dramatic authors, and it was at the christening of her child that she was seized with inflammation of the chest, which terminated so fatally, at the age of 24.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

The history of the brothers "Ricci" continues to be a comedy of errors. It was first announced that Luigi Ricci was dead; and then the notice was corrected, and it was stated that it was Frederick Ricci who had expired on his way to Russia. Now it turns out that Frederick Ricci, who was left for dead, has recovered, and both the brother composers are still alive, to delight the musical public with more operas. Luigi Ricci is Director of Music at Odessa, where by the sons Frederick has joined them.

M Servais, one of the most accomplished violoncellists in Europe, is expected in London during the season. He is now at St. Petersburg, giving farewell concerts. His fine Amati violoncello, and his command of the instrument wonderful. Another great violoncellist, M. Franchomme, of Paris, is also to come to London.

M. Leonard, an accomplished violinist of the Belgian school, and one of the most finished players of chamber music, is going to Russia, after giving a concert in Paris. He is the friend of Vieuxtemps, Artot, Servais, and the cousin of Vieuxtemps.

Malibran, whose singing of Spanish romances, a few seasons since, was so much admired. Beethoven's Fidelio" was produced last Saturday night, at the Théâtre des Italiens, with Mdlle. Cruvelli, who has greatly increased in skill. Corbari delighted the public in Adina, in the "Elisir d'Amore."

Halévy's "Juif Errant" will be produced at the Grand Opera in a few days.

Mdlle. Alboni is now in Madrid. Mdlle. Vera is prima donna at Barcelona.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The coming fixtures for the ensuing week are more numerous than interesting. They commence on Monday with the Newmarket Club Meeting, which, with a new and untried judge, promises three or four days sport. Blackpool and Worcester races fall on Monday; Tuesday is the last day at Warwick (Whitsy) and Newhallcross (Nantwich), on Wednesday; Baldock, on Wednesday and Thursday; and Everley (Amesbury), on Thursday and two following days. The Carmarthenshire flat and steeple races take place on Monday and Tuesday, and the Fylde steeplechases on Wednesday.

A number of Dominican friars, having a long white dress covered with a black cloak, were on Wednesday seen walking in the streets of the metropolis. The strangeness of their costume attracted general notice. It is to this order that the Abbé Lacordaire belongs.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

SEAMEN'S HOSPITAL SOCIETY.—On Wednesday, the thirty-first annual meeting of the governors and patrons of this institution, which offers a refuge for sick and diseased seamen of all nations on board the Dreadnought, off Greenwich, was held at the society's offices, 74, King William-street, City; Mr. John Wild in the chair. The report stated, that the provision in the act, by which a sum not exceeding £350 was to be paid by the Board of Trade for seven years, had been duly carried out, and the quarterly payments received. Among the legacies bequeathed during the past year was one of £100 from the executors of Vice-Admiral Bouverie; and the successful exertions of Mr. R. Green, the committee's late solicitor, of Blackwall, to add to the funds of the society, by bobbing a fancy fair on board two of his ships, the receipts from which amounted to £1000, were gratefully acknowledged. The number of patients admitted during the past year has been 2413, out-patients, 1642; entire number from the formation of the hospital in 1821, 69,587; of whom 3159 were in the Royal navy, and 1798 in the East India Company's service, while no fewer than 60 630 belonged to merchant vessels of different nations. The financial account showed the receipts for the year to have been £2929s 4s 8d, and the disbursements £3056 2s. 1d.; and £3000 of the society's funds had been invested in the purchase of stock. It was stated that Prince Albert, though debarred from becoming president in the room of the late Lord Melville, had subscribed 101 guineas to the funds, her Majesty also being a subscriber to a like amount. A vote of thanks to the auditors, Messrs. Soames and Walton, and a similar compliment to the chairman, concluded the proceedings.

RELIEF OF HIGHLAND DESTITUTION.—At a meeting of the Highland Industrial Relief Committee, held at 18, Parliament-street, on Tuesday last —Sheriff Gordon in the chair—the treasurer was authorised to exhaust the existing balance at the banker's by forwarding to the destitute districts upwards of £300 to be applied in immediate relief; and arrangements were made for opening a depôt in London for the exhibition and sale of goods received in return. Among those present at the meeting were, Sir James Clarke, Bart., M.D.; Col Sir Duncan M'Dougall, Bart.; Charles Forbes, Esq (of Aslown); Capt. A. M'Donald; George Bain, Esq., Hon Secretary of the Highland Society of London, and Chas. Bond, Esq., Secretary of the Royal Patriotic and Industrial Society of Scotland. The latter gentleman produced a report which confirmed the existence of severe distress

BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—A meeting of the governors and committee of this useful charity, which was founded in the year 1847, for granting pensions and giving relief to deserved members of the building trades, was held on Monday at their offices, New Oxford-street; Mr. George Bird, treasurer, in the chair. The old Electric Telegraph Company and the Midland company had severally petitioned against the British Electric Telegraph Company, the old company alleging that they had made agreements with various railway companies for the space at purposes of excluding them and keeping up a monopoly. The Midland company were large shareholders in the old Electric Telegraph company. There was also a petition from the South-Eastern company against the bill. A resolution was agreed to authorising the directors to borrow from time to time, under the powers of the act, such sum or sums as might be required for the purposes of the company.

PATENT LAW AMENDMENT.—A public meeting, convened by the Patent Law Amendment Association, was held on Monday evening, at the Belle Sauvage Hotel, Ludgate-hill, for the purpose of receiving a report of the progress of the question. Mr. Alderman Sidney, M.P., occupied the chair. The report stated that the large sum of £5000 was required to be paid by the inventor before he could secure his property in his own invention for the United Kingdom; whereas an outlay of less than £10 would secure a patent in either France, Belgium, Holland, or America. It was announced, in a letter written by Mr. James Booth from the office of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade, that it was the intention of the Government to introduce a bill into Parliament early this session for the amendment of the law of patents. Resolutions enunciatory of the object of the society were agreed to.

The claims and payments during the year (including management, £6458; claims on deaths, &c., £142 [illegible] surrendered policies, £7359; law charges, £721; bonuses, £38,526) amounted to £195,152. Gaskell, president, in the chair. It appeared, that, although the association has been scarcely six months in existence, 709 shares, of £20 each, have been taken up by 263 members. At the meeting was addressed by Mr. Gaskell, the treasurer, and Mr. Sadler, M.P., in support of the establishment of such societies.

HOME COUNTIES AND METROPOLITAN FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.—On Monday evening a meeting was held at the London Coffee-House, Ludgate-hill, for the purpose of explaining the principles of the above society; Lord D. Stuart, M.P., presided. Resolutions supporting the principles of such societies, as being well calculated to promote the elevation and improvement of the industrious classes, were unanimously agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.—Several meetings have been held during the week in the metropolis for the purpose of promoting a comprehensive measure of Parliamentary reform. In the important parishes of Marylebone and St. Pancras the meetings on the subject took place on Monday. At the former the chair was taken by T. K. Pritchard, Esq. Amongst those present were Sir Benjamin Hall, M.P.; Lord Dudley Stuart, M.P., Sir Charles Napier, &c. Resolutions were passed, requesting their members to use their endeavours to obtain such a reform of the House of Commons as was embodied in the principles of the National Parliamentary and Financial Reform Association, and a petition upon the subject was agreed to. At St. Pancras the meeting was presided over by Mr. T. E. Baker, one of the churchwardens, when similar resolutions were adopted.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—At the meeting on Tuesday evening—J. Simpson, Esq., Vice-President, in the chair the discussion was renewed on Mr. Jee's paper "On the Cast Iron Viaduct erected at Manchester, forming part of the line and station of the London and North-Western, and Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railways." Mr. Hawkshaw described a similar structure which had been erected at Salford in 1842, forming a junction between the Liverpool and Manchester and the Bolton and Leeds, and Bolton Railways. Some interesting experiments on the strength of the girders were given, and the ingenious steelyard lever testing machine was described. The question then arose, how to protect upon the regular forms of the wrought-iron girder-bridge over Store-street. From minute calculations which it appeared that this bridge was, foot for foot, as strong and stiff as wrought-iron, cellular-plate, tubular girders of the ordinary form; and though, in this instance, the size of the cylindrical tube which would be large enough to admit a man for painting the inside, and for necessary repairs, might seem disproportioned to the depth of the girder, yet this would not be the case if the span and depth of the girder were greater, as the cylindrical tube would still remain of the same size. Doubts were raised as to whether painting was the best mode of protecting wrought iron from oxidation; and it was suggested, as an improvement, that the iron should, in the first instance, be thoroughly cleaned, and plunged at a low heat in common oil, and then dried. An alloy of cast iron, containing a small portion of tin, was also said to prevent effectually the injurious effects of oxidation. The method of covering wrought with cast-iron, by Stirling's process, was also described, and the great tenacity and strength of the metal was fully admitted. At the monthly ballot the following candidates were duly elected:—Capt. Owen Stanley, R.N., Capt. Fraser, R.E.; Lieut. Kendall, R.E.; Capt. Owen, R.E.; and Mr. Peter Paterson, as Associates.

BANKING INSTITUTE.—EFFECTS OF THE GOLD DISCOVERIES.—The third monthly meeting of the members of this institute took place on Tuesday, at their rooms, in Threadneedle-street; Sir Moses Montefiore in the chair. Mr. Dalton, the honorary secretary, read a paper upon the subject of the recent discoveries of gold in California and Australia. In the absence of fixed incomes arising from the funds and other securities bearing interest. A discussion took place on the course of which Mr. Tennant expressed an opinion that many of the gold lately come from America had they been duly thrown open to the public competitions, as was the case in regard to the mine discovered in Brazil in 1824. He believed, from what he had seen and heard, and from the specimens which had lately come from America, that they were duly throwing away more valuable articles than they [illegible] many of the specimens he [illegible] [illegible] and, during these [illegible] presents, diamonds with the ore. Mr Cashenwood said that there were from 180 000 to 200,000 per cent engaged in the gold-mining districts in California, whose average earnings did not amount to more than 7s or 8s a day. After some further conversation, the business of the evening terminated with a vote of thanks to Mr. Dalton and the chairman.

MIDDLESEX HOSPITAL.—On Thursday, the annual court of the governors of this hospital was held in the board-room: Sir Robert J. Inglis, Bart., in the chair. The income of the charity exhibited a falling off of £600 as compared with the preceding year, and had been exceeded by upwards of £230 0. The number of patients at present in the hospital was 295. The report was adopted, the officers for the ensuing year appointed, and some routine business transacted.

ROYAL DISPENSARY FOR DISEASES OF THE EAR.—The late John Reeves, Esq., has left a legacy of one hundred guineas to the above-named charitable institution.

LONDON AND COUNTY JOINT-STOCK BANK.—On Thursday the half-yearly meeting of the shareholders in this bank was held at the London Tavern: John Saunter, Esq., presiding, when a report was presented, which stated that the net profits for the half-year ending 31st December, 1851, amounted to £1,691 14s. 9d. The directors recommended the payment of a dividend at the rate of six per cent. per annum, free of income-tax, or one per cent., both free from income-tax, for a bonus of £5, to be carried to the contingent fund, which would thus be increased to £38,447 2s 6d. During the past year, an arrangement had been entered into for the transference of the business of the Bonar Union Banking Company to the London and County Bank, and which had been established at Carlisle. Six minor branches, which were not considered profitable, had been suppressed. The report was adopted, the dividend declared, and the retiring directors re-elected.

ROYAL MATERNITY CHARITY.—On Thursday the annual meeting of this charity was held at the London Tavern; W. Cotton, Esq., presiding. The report stated that during the past year 3450 women had been delivered by the medical officers of the charity, being an increase of 150 in the corresponding year, a decrease being caused by the tickets being issued to each governor instead of eight, in consequence of a debt existing against the charity. The receipts for the year amounted to £2699 2s. 10d.; and the expenditure, including the purchase of £876 in the Three per Cents, and the extinction of the debt of £377 17s 11d., to £2276 18s. 3d., leaving a balance of £422 10s 7d to the credit of the charity. The superannuation fund for the midwives amounted to £295, and there were now five pensioners upon it, receiving £5 a month each. The report was adopted ALMSHOUSES FOR DISTRESSED FOREIGNERS.—On Thursday a special meeting of the governors of the Society of the Friends of Foreigners in Distress was held in the offices, London-wall (John Labouchere, Esq., in the chair), when it having been reported that £5 0 had been expended in the purchase of a site for the almshouses, on Knight's Hill, Norwood, it was resolved at once to proceed with the erection of three groups of houses, which will cost £3500. The available funds at present in the hands of the society amount only to £2700.

SOCIETY FOR IMPROVING THE CONDITION OF THE POOR.—On Thursday a meeting of this society took place at the residence of the treasurer, Sir Alexander Morison, M.D., in Cavendish-square, when Edward Wyndham, Esq., was elected president in the room of Sir Peter Laurie, deceased. Five cases awards were given to George Pratt and Jane Gotts, who have been respectively 19 and 28 years in Bethlem Hospital, for long and meritorious service. Second-class awards were given to Ann Wright, for 24 years in the Surrey County Lunatic Asylum, and — Bell, for 26 years' service at Fisherton Lunatic Asylum, Salisbury. To a ward of the prize of 20 guineas for the best essay on the "Personal Restraint of the Insane" was left over for the decision at the next meeting of the society, when it will take place.

METROPOLITAN RIFLE CLUBS.—A body of influential gentlemen, at the West-End, have for the last few days been busily engaged in forming an association having for its object the establishment of rifle clubs in the various districts of London. A numerous meeting was held on Thursday evening last at the Thatched House tavern, St. James's, when various resolutions were carried, and a committee formed for the purpose of carrying them into effect. It was stated that it is the intention of the committee to raise subscriptions for the purpose of procuring rifles for the use of such members as may be unable or indisposed to purchase them. Among the first subscriptions received for carrying out the object was one of £5 from Mrs. Alfred Tennyson, and another of the same amount from the Poet Laureate himself.

OPENING OF THE CRYSTAL PALACE TO THE PUBLIC.—On Saturday the building passed formally from the hands of the Commissioners into those of Messrs. Fox and Henderson, the contractors; and all the articles remaining outside became the property of the Royal Commission, and such as are not claimed will be sold, as a national museum will be established, and their proceeds added to the guarantee fund. The gratuitous admission of the public commenced on Monday, by ticket, to be obtained on application from the Royal Commissioners, the concourse of the number to be limited till after the visits of the Queen and members of Parliament.

SOUTHWARK LITERARY INSTITUTION.—On Wednesday evening a library presented by Mr. Apsley Pellatt was opened by Mr. Apsley Pellatt, before a numerous audience, at this institution. Mr. Pellatt, by the aid of numerous diagrams and models in various stages of preparation, exhibited the whole process by which flint glass, vase, jug, bowl, or vessel was brought into shape and pattern in which it came into domestic use. He also showed some account of works which he had seen at Venice and Bohemia; and, whilst contrasting the rate of wages in Bohemia and in England, stated that where expense was not objected to, and expedition required, the English workman excelled in the fine art department, could be obtained here as elsewhere.

LETRAMURAL INTERMENTS.—Deputations from the parishes of Marylebone and Paddington waited upon Lord John Russell on Saturday, on the above subject. They were headed respectively by Sir Benjamin Hall, M.P., and Lord Duncan Stuart, M.P. Memorials were presented to the Lord ship praying for the introduction of a bill for the purpose of empowering the parish authorities to raise money and to levy rates for the purchasing of sites for intramural interments, for the appointment, likewise, of a chaplain; and for the establishing of a burial-ground for the poor of the parish under local control. Lord John Russell, in reply, said that the general principle of the measure to which reference was made was agreed upon by the Government, and that Lord Seymour was charged with the duty of preparing the bill. Notwithstanding many difficulties in the way, he trusted that the measure about to be introduced would prove successful. So far from its being the object of the Government to have any control in these matters, they felt that they had quite enough to do already. It was, therefore, far from their wish to be mixed up with them.

THE MUMMY FOUND IN ST. STEPHEN'S CRYPT.—On Saturday a minute examination of the mummy found a few days since took place in the presence of a deputation of members of the Antiquarian Society, amongst whom were Dr. Lysons, Mr. Hawkins, and Mr. Franks, of the antiquarian department of the British Museum, Mr. Prior, Mr. Bruce, and Mr. Akerman, the secretary of the Antiquarian Society. Mr. Barry, the architect, was in attendance. The mummy was first considered to remain in the body, which was removed from its narrow cell and placed upon a bench. An incision having been made down the centre of the abdomen, and in a lateral direction round the skull, a layer of five thick canvas cloths was removed from off the face. A second series bound round by string having been presented themselves, they were in due course loosened, and the face was disclosed in a most remarkable state of preservation. A marriage of the nose was not at all disturbed, and the teeth, hair, and other portions of the face, remained perfectly flexible to the touch. Even the expression of the countenance was in a degree retained so that it was manifest that identity of the individual would not have been impossible had any coroner of his venerable age been present. The stomach was found to have retained from the cloth, and to have become a mass of adipose matter, in which state the legs and arms were also found. No writing of any description was discovered in the folds, nor was any mark leading to an identity of the individual found. The body measured 5 feet 4 inches in length, ranging from the front teeth remaining, three or four of which, in the lower jaw, were the most perfect. It was then cut of a very aged man. The mouth was filled with tow, which had evidently been steeped in wax; and a small quantity of hair remained on the chin and upper lip. The crosier was found curving from the left shoulder, and the crook—the whole measuring six feet two inches in length. It may be stated that the gentleman present unanimously agreed that the presumption of its being the crosier of St. David's, who died almost immediately on the discovery century, was almost indisputable. The examination having been completed, the remains were placed in a strong case and screwed down.

RAILWAY OPERATIVES' LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.—At a special meeting of the vestry of St. Pancras, held at the Vestry Hall, Camdentown, on Wednesday, a report was read having reference to the recent proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench, in connexion with the rating of the London and North-Western Railway. The report complained that the reports in the public press were one-sided, and that, so far from the vestry being chargeable with immorality and injustice, the charge was more properly applicable to the railway company. The figures in the award were found to be wrong, and that there was a reduction made of 36 per cent. in the gross estimated rental, which was an injustice on all the rest of the ratepayers, who were only allowed a reduction of 10 per cent. When the company were summoned before a magistrate for non-payment of a subsequent rate, even their own counsel admitted that the arbitrator had made a mistake in the award, and had exceeded the scope of his authority. The report censured the conduct of Lord Campbell, stating upon his judicial bench, making the observations he did upon an ex parte case, and declaring that the Court erroneously assumed that the vestry desired to deny or attempt to escape from the agreement. It was therefore their duty, as ratepayers, to the Western Railway Company exercised an influence of a formidable character; but still it would be for the vestry to decide whether it should succumb to this influence, or continue in the line it had taken. The report was adopted in a manner injurious to the interests of the general body of the ratepayers.—Mr. Thomas E. Bacon, the senior churchwarden, and chairman on the occasion, addressed the meeting at some length, and moved—Having been followed by several other gentlemen, the report was unanimously adopted.

METROPOLITAN SEWERS.—On Wednesday evening, a public meeting of deputies from the metropolitan parishes took place at the Marylebone Court-house, to adopt measures to secure a reform in the administration of the sewerage and drainage of the metropolitan districts: Mr. Nicholay in the chair. A resolution was passed to the effect that the meeting be adjourned for a week, and in the meantime the committee already appointed proceed with the duties of the bill prepared, and report thereon to the meeting for their approbation, and that the delegates should wait upon Lord John Russell, to call his attention to the subject upon the attention or the Government. It was further resolved that Sir B. Hall be requested to make an appointment with Lord John Russell to receive the deputation as early as possible after Wednesday next.—The meeting then terminated.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

CITY COMMISSIONERS OF SEWERS.—At a meeting of the Commissioners on Tuesday the Lord Mayor in the chair—the new commission was opened, and the minutes of the last court were confirmed. A petition was presented from the owners of premises in a portion of Newgate-market, praying permission to a sublet cattle thereto, the buildings to be furnished with an abundance of water, and in every respect to be adapted to the requirements of the act. The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

NEW RIVER COMPANY.—The very rare occurrence of the offer to public competition of an entire share in the property of this company took place on Tuesday, at the Auction Mart, by Daniel Smith, Esq., when a very much larger number than the property of the company was divided into 72 shares, on which for the last four years an average dividend of £850 had been paid, exclusive of the redeemed land tax of £200 a share paid by the company to the shareholders, making a total of £900 per share per annum, and the dividend for the last 25 years had been regularly and progressively increasing, with the exception of the year 1800, when it fell £30 per share, by reason of the large amount expended on the improvements of the works; the company supplied 80,000 houses with water, and its gross income was £160,000, and in the course of a few years, from the falling in of leases, a immense rental would be derived from its estates. There being no offer made for the whole share, it was offered in quarters, the first of which realised £4200, the second £4350, the third £4400, and the fourth £4450. A purchaser paying £4250, secured on four shares in the property of the company, was sold for £4500.

OPENING OF THE NEW CHURCH AT LAMBETH.—On Tuesday the parish church of Lambeth, which has been entirely rebuilt, was opened with much ceremony by the Bishop of Winchester, assisted by a large number of the local clergy. The new edifice is built upon the old foundations, and follows the ancient ground-plan. It consists of a nave, with aisles, a chancel, porch, and a tower, and is built throughout of Kentish rag, in the early decorated style of architecture. The roof is open and of handsome construction; that of the chancel is vaulted in oak. The sermon in the morning was preached by the Bishop, that in the evening by the Venerable Archdeacon Robinson, D.D., Master of the Temple.

M. Cabet, the famous chief of the Icarians, has arrived in town from Paris. He was accompanied to the steam-boat at Calais by the police agents. His absence from France is not voluntary.

FIRE.—At half-past five o'clock on Thursday morning a fire broke out upon the premises of Mr. Joseph Addison, known as the Broadwall Steam Saw Mills, situate at 1176, Broadwall, Stamford-street, Blackfriars-road. Several engines were speedily upon the spot, and a ready supply of water easily procured, but, from the inflammable nature of the materials, and the hold which the conflagration had attained upon a large mass of sawn deals, the firemen were unable to prevent the total destruction of the saw-mills, together with nearly the whole of the contents, in less than an hour. The origin of the fire is unknown; but it is surmised that a spark must have fallen upon the sawdust or shavings on the premises, even upon the most cautious precautions being taken by labour, and, after smouldering during the night of the night, suddenly burst into a flame in the morning. The amount of property destroyed in the present instance must certainly, even upon the most moderate calculation, be very large.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—The births registered in the week ending Saturday, January 31, were—males, 822; females, 794: total, 1616. In the seven corresponding weeks of 1845-51 the average was only 1415. The deaths during the week were—males, 501; females, 501: total, 1002. The official report states that the deaths from all causes registered in the metropolitan districts have shown throughout the four weeks of January a tendency to decline, the numbers returned for those periods having been as follows:—1111, 1096, 1061, and in the week which ended last Saturday, as stated above, 1002. In the ten weeks corresponding to last week of the years 1842-51, the average number was 1171, of which 0.9 per cent. is stated to be the proportion for the increased amount of population now in London, it will become 1178, compared with which the mortality of last week shows a decrease of 176.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—At the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, the mean height of the barometer was 29.716 in. The mean temperature was 42.1 deg., or nearly 4 degrees above the average of corresponding weeks in years. The mean daily temperatures was above the average of corresponding days on every day of the week except Wednesday. Tuesday, Friday, and Saturday it was about 6 deg. above the average. The wind blew generally from this south-west. The amount of rain which fell during the week was 0.64 in.

THE PROTECTIONIST PARTY.—On Tuesday a meeting of the members of the Country party who are members of the House of Commons took place at the mansion of the Earl of Derby, St. James's-square. The noble Lord expressed at considerable length his views upon the leading questions that must immediately be discussed in Parliament. The speech of the noble Lord was, on the occasion, as nearly as possible the same as that delivered by him in the House of Lords the same night.

THE ENGINEERS' STRIKE.—A committee of employers has been sitting for the last few days to consider the time when, and the condition under which, the shops should be re-opened, but nothing has transpired with respect to their decision. The position of the workmen remains unchanged. They appear resolved to maintain their present attitude. The number of men out of employ in the metropolis is nearly the same as last week; viz., 3000 at Messrs. Maudslay and Co.'s, 1000 at Messrs. Penn's, and 1000 at the Atlas Works, Shadwell. Messrs. Miller and Ravenhill's, Blackwall, and Messrs. Rennie's, Lambeth, remain fully employed. The Mare-end-road and are now actively employed on their own account. According to a letter written by Henry, the secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers at Manchester, dated January 30, it appears that the sum paid on that day to cabmen, non-cabmen, and agents amounted to £7382 17s. 6d. The writer goes on to say that the trades were with Lock, and that they were getting more money from them; that there were five public meetings to be held that night in various large towns in the neighbourhood, at each of which deputations from the society were to attend; and that the men were in excellent spirits. The proposed grant of £10,000 for co-operative purposes is said to be affirmed, and measures are being quickly taken towards carrying out the propositions of the executive council of the society. Mr. Thomas Hill, City-road, has offered to advance 5s. to each labourer by way of loan, to be repaid shortly after entering to work. Messrs. Maudslay and Co. intend to divide their men to work by relays of eight men each week. Messrs. Miller and Ravenhill have by agreement by turns out of about 40 to watch their lower factory by night, so that each man may only for one night's pay per fortnight. At their upper factory they give employment three days each week to 15 labourers out of about 40 or 50, so that each man may look for one day's work on an average in three weeks. There are, however, about 600 men with no other resource but public benevolence. An appeal to the public is put forth on behalf of the unskilled labourers in the iron trade now suffering through the pending claims of the operative engineers. The Amalgamated Engineers at the railway shops refuse to open up a dispute with its engineering workmen, and in the course of a week there will be 200 men turned out, being members of the Amalgamated Society. At a meeting of the operative engineers, Messrs. Maudslay, and the employers of Operative Engineers, &c., held on Tuesday at their office in Bucklersbury, it was resolved to open their establishments on Monday next to any of all the operatives required, on each signing the following declaration:—"I do hereby honestly declare, that I am neither now, nor will I during the continuance of any engagement with my present employers become, a member of or support any society whatever, or any of its rules, meetings, or funds, professes to control or interfere with the arrangements or regulations of any business in connexion with my present employers' establishment, the hours or terms of labour, the agreements of employers or employed, or the qualifications of persons to work with me. I do also further declare, that I will not, while in my present employment, call in question any rule or act of any man to follow any honest calling in which he may desire to engage, or of any employer to make such arrangements, and engage what workmen he pleases, upon whatever terms they choose mutually to agree." In Manchester there are about 70 trades societies, and of these about 30 or 40 sent delegates to a meeting at the Brewers' Arms, Oldham-road, a few days ago, where it was resolved to support the engineers in "the present strike against the tyrant employers." The engineers in employment in Manchester and Salford contributed last week nearly £200. The labourers' funds are, however, coming in very sowly. It was stated on Tuesday that Messrs. Galloway and Son, of Manchester, had taken 40 or 50 society men on, upon the understanding that pending the strike they were to work over-hours when emergencies occurred, receiving double wages for extra hours. With an allowance of one hour and a half for refreshment during the night: the agreement to be void should the strike not result in favour of the operatives.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint Thomas Weld Blundell, of Ince Blundell Hall, Esq., to be sheriff of the county palatine of Lancaster for the ensuing year.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Opening at the closing quotation of Saturday, the English Market as the day advanced showed a greater tendency to firmness. The first price of Consols was 96¾, and the last quotation 96⅞; but no business was done in them on Monday, although after the publication of the Queen's Speech it was registered for a short time. The closing quotation was 96¾ ⅝ for Money. Great activity prevailed on Wednesday, and the unusually large money balances induced an advance of ¼ per cent., the last quotation being 96⅞ ⅝ for Money and Account. A steady business was done on Thursday, at a trifling decline in prices. The Unfunded Debt has increased, and India Bonds are firm. India Stock is rather heavy. The closing quotations of the week are—for Bank Stock, 216; Reduced, 97; Consols, 96⅞; New Three and a Quarter per Cent. Annuities, 99; Long Annuities, to expire Jan., 1860, 7 1-16; Ditto, 30 years, Oct. 10, 1859, 6 13-16; India Stock, 259; India Bonds, under £1000, 70 prem.; Consols for Account, 96⅞; Exchequer Bills, £1000, 62 prem.; £500, ditto, 62 prem.; Ditto, Small, 63 prem.

Considerable activity occurred in the Foreign Funds on Monday, Spanish, Grenada Deferred, and Equador quoted 4, Grenada ex December 1851 and 17, and Mexican 31¼ to 32¾. A less animated market prevailed on Tuesday, but the value of Mexican firmly maintained its previous rise, and on Wednesday the market was generally firm. Spanish Stock declined on Thursday, in consequence of an attempt to assassinate the Queen of Spain. The Actives receded to 22⅝ 23. Mexican bonds are firm at 32 to 32¼. The voting of the indemnity money is under the consideration of the United States Legislature. At the close of the week's business the market was a shade firmer, the last prices being for Equador Bonds, 4; Grenada Bonds, ex Dec., 1845, Coupons, 17; Ditto, Deferred, 5⅝; Mexican, 5 per Cent., ex Jan. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

SUPPLEMENT.

VOL. XX.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1852. [GRATIS.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

On Tuesday her Majesty in person opened the fifth, and, as is generally presumed, the last, Session of the present Parliament.

The day was unusually bright, warm, and cheerful, the sun shining out with a brilliancy which is so usual on the occasions of her Majesty's Royal pageants, that these pleasant exceptions to the general gloominess of our climate are fondly known in popular parlance as "Queen's days."

The throng of orderly well-dressed sight-seekers in the Park, Whitehall, Parliament-street, and the entire line of the Royal procession from the Palace to the Houses of Parliament, was accordingly very great, and has not been equalled in numbers for many years past. Crowd pressed on crowd of persons of all ages and sexes, until the throng became one dense swaying living mass, jammed into every spot available for a view of the cortège, which passed slowly along between the countless thousands in the narrow avenue, which was kept by the Royal Guards, cavalry and infantry. Early in the day the Fusiliers marched into Abingdon-street, and occupied the whole length of the parapet in front of Victoria Tower. Later the Horse Guards arrived, and took up their positions so as to form an avenue from Bridge-street up to the Victoria Tower. A large company of the Yeomen of the Guard entered the building by the temporary way made close to the tower, and they formed themselves along the passages through which the Queen would have to pass from the grand entrance to the House of Lords.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert left Buckingham Palace at two o'clock. The cortège consisted of eight carriages. A squadron of Guards led the procession, and the last, the Royal state carriage, was immediately preceded and followed by other parties of the Guards. The Gentlemen-at-Arms, the Yeomen of the Guard, and the running footmen were in their usual places, and presented an ensemble of the invariable gorgeousness. Her Majesty and the Prince were warmly cheered on emerging into the park; and this greeting was continuously hearty the whole length of the route.

At the foot of the grand staircase, under Victoria Tower, the great officers of state, the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Norfolk, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chamberlain, were in readiness, shortly after two, to receive the Queen. As the Royal carriage came in sight, the Fusiliers' band played the National Anthem; and, as the Queen and her Consort were alighting guns were being fired, and St. Margaret's bells were being rung, and the people were cheering.

Her Majesty, on the present occasion, entered her new Palace at Westminster by the grand staircase beneath the massive and magnificent Victoria Tower, which rears its gigantic dimensions at the south-west corner of the Palace in Abingdon-street.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

The House was thrown open at twelve o'clock, and was quickly filled by Peeresses, visitors, and all who had the entrée. The interior presented the brilliant and variegated spectacle usual upon these occasions. The attendance, however, appeared to be larger than ordinary, and the ladies had completely occupied the benches allotted to them at an earlier hour than usual. The Peers also mustered in no common force, and additional seats had to be provided. Among the earliest was the venerable Duke of Wellington, who appeared in excellent health and spirits, and who conversed with several of his friends in a sonorous tone, which could be heard all over the House. The judges speedily assembled: among them the amiable and excellent judge whose services the country is about to lose—Mr. Justice Patteson. The foreign Ambassadors came down in their glistening and magnificent array, and the episcopal bench was well represented. Towards two o'clock a polite official might be observed gliding from rank to rank, and urging upon aristocratic ladies that cloaks and shawls must now be taken off; and he was obeyed. The first gun was heard at ten minutes past two.

Shortly afterwards the procession entered, and her Majesty, who was looking exceedingly well, conducted by Prince Albert, took her seat upon the throne. His Royal Highness took his place on the chair of state at her Majesty's left. Her Majesty wore a robe of silver tissue, with a tiara, stomacher, and necklace of brilliants; her robe and train were composed of dark crimson velvet, embroidered with gold. The Prince wore a field-marshal's uniform.

The Usher of the Black Rod having been ordered to summon the Commons, the members of the Lower House, headed by the Speaker, quickly appeared in the place assigned them below the bar.

The Royal Speech, presented by the Lord Chancellor, was then delivered by her Majesty, who, in her usual clear and distinct elocution, made every word audible in the remotest corner of the House. The Speech was as follows:—

QUEEN'S SPEECH.

"MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

"The period has arrived when, according to usage, I can again avail myself of your advice and assistance in the preparation and adoption of measures which the welfare of the country may require.

"I continue to maintain the most friendly relations with foreign powers.

"The complicated affairs of the Duchies of Holstein and Schleswig have continued to engage my attention. I have every reason to expect that the treaty between Germany and Denmark, which was concluded at Berlin in the year before last, will, in a short time, be fully and completely executed.

"I regret that the war which unfortunately broke out on the eastern frontier of the Cape of Good Hope, more than a year ago, still continues. Papers will be laid before you containing full information as to the progress of the war, and the measures which have been taken for bringing it to a termination.

"While I have observed with sincere satisfaction the tranquillity which has prevailed throughout the greater portion of Ireland, it is with much regret that I have to inform you, that certain parts of the counties of Armagh, Monaghan, and Louth have been marked by the commission of outrages of the most serious description. The powers of the existing law have been promptly exerted for the detection of the offenders, and for the repression of a system of crime and violence fatal to the best interests of the country. My attention will continue to be directed to this important object.

"GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS,

"I have ordered estimates of the expenses of the current year to be laid before you.

"I rely with confidence on your loyalty and zeal to make adequate provision for the public service.

"Where any increase has been made in the present over the past year, such explanations will be given as will, I trust, satisfy you that such increase is consistent with a steady adherence to a pacific policy and with the dictates of a wise economy.

"MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

"The improvement of the administration of justice in its various departments has continued to receive my anxious attention, and, in furtherance of that object, I have directed bills to be prepared founded upon the reports made to me by the respective Commissioners appointed to inquire into the practice and proceedings of the superior Courts of Law and Equity.

"As nothing tends more to the peace, prosperity, and contentment of a country than the speedy and impartial administration of justice, I earnestly recommend these measures to your deliberate attention.

"The Act of 1838 for suspending the operation of a previous Act conferring representative institutions on New Zealand will expire early in the next year. I am happy to believe that there is no necessity for its renewal, and that no obstacle any longer exists to the enjoyment of representative institutions by New Zealand. The form of these institutions will, however, require your consideration, and the additional information which has been obtained since the passing of the acts in question will, I trust, enable you to arrive at a decision beneficial to that important colony.

"It gives me great satisfaction to be able to state to you that the large reductions of taxes which have taken place of late years have not been attended with a proportionate diminution of the national income. The revenue of the past year has been fully adequate to the demands of the public service, while the reduction of taxation has tended greatly to the relief and comfort of my subjects.

"I acknowledge with thankfulness to Almighty God, that tranquillity, good order, and willing obedience to the laws continue to prevail generally throughout the country.

"It appears to me that this is a fitting time for calmly considering whether it may not be advisable to make such amendments in the Act of the late reign relating to the representation of the Commons in Parliament as may be deemed calculated to carry into more complete effect the principles upon which that law is founded.

"I have the fullest confidence that in any such consideration you will firmly adhere to the acknowledged principles of the Constitution, by which the prerogatives of the Crown, the authority of both Houses of Parliament, and the rights and liberties of the people, are equally secured."

As soon as her Majesty had finished reading the Speech she rose, and the Royal procession left the House in the same order in which it had entered, and the brilliant assembly gradually broke up.

On the return to the Palace, her Majesty and the Prince were greeted with the hearty cheers of crowds who still thronged the line of route.

Their Lordships re-assembled at five o'clock.

THE ADDRESS.

The LORD CHANCELLOR having read her Majesty's gracious Speech from the throne, which was again read by the clerk at the table,

The Earl of ALBEMARLE moved that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, in answer to the Royal Speech, and in the course of his observations the noble Earl reviewed in approving terms all the topics mentioned in that document. He had no apprehensions, he said, of invasion, sudden or deliberate; but he recommended the country to provide against such a contingency.

Lord LEIGH seconded the Address, alluding mainly to the financial position of the country.

The Earl of DERBY said that the Speech from the Throne consisted of fifteen paragraphs, and, as there were fifteen Cabinet Ministers, that one paragraph was contributed by each, after which they drew lots to know which should have precedence. He commented on the absence from the Speech of all allusion to the depressed state of agriculture, and also to the omission of any allusion to the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, and touching seriatim on the various topics it referred to, from the Kaffir war down to the special commission on the north of Ireland, he asked the Government if they believed the Ecclesiastical Titles Act had been sufficient for its purpose. For his own part he believed that it had not—that it had been, in fact, a dead letter, and was even ostentatiously violated. He was glad to be informed that we were in a state of amity with foreign powers; but, if such were the case, he should like to know why it was that it became necessary to sacrifice the ablest Cabinet Minister they possessed because he was carrying out the foreign policy of the Government. After highly eulogising the ability of Lord Palmerston, the noble Earl proceeded to say that he had the most perfect confidence in the Prince President, whose interest it was, as it was also the interest of the French people, to maintain peace with this country. But, although admitting the intentions of the Prince President to be amicable, he could not shut his eyes to the fact that the French army was such that the smallest spark might set it in a blaze, and it therefore behoved us to be on the defensive. If, therefore, the Government should think it necessary to augment the supplies, neither himself nor those with whom he acted would refuse them to the Government.

Earl GREY, in replying to the observations of the Earl of Derby, contended that there was no such agricultural distress as to call for special notice in the Speech from the throne. The British farmer, in most parts of the kingdom, had had the advantage of excellent crops in all descriptions of produce, and had an ample return for his outlay, except perhaps in wheat alone. The farmer had, therefore, no right to be discouraged. He denied that the Ecclesiastical Titles Act was a dead letter, and said that the Roman Catholic prelates were taking the greatest pains to avoid committing themselves to the penalties of that act. The noble Earl gave an explanation with respect to the dismissal of Lord Palmerston similar to that given by Lord J. Russell in the House of Commons.

The Duke of RICHMOND expressed his belief that the tenant-farmers of England and Scotland were suffering greater privations than any other class of the community. He thought the policy of this country ought to be to place a duty on the import of foreign corn, and to protect native industry. As British labourers could not live in the same way as the serfs of Poland, he thought they must have protection.

Lord BROUGHAM said that even if he had agreed in every respect in the opinions which had been so strongly pronounced against the late proceedings in France, the manner of discussing these proceedings, and the personalities with which they had been accompanied, could not have met with his approval.

The Earl of WINCHILSEA called their Lordships' recollection to the fact, that with regard to one measure of last session, the Papal Aggression Bill, the Government had not dared to put it in force, although its provisions had been violated in more than one instance. With regard to the subject of protection, he was fully prepared to give his hearty support to any measure for imposing a duty upon foreign corn.

The Earl of YARBOROUGH said he would be glad if the Earl of Derby would inform the farmers what he meant by an import duty on foreign corn for the purpose of revenue? Would he say whether he meant that the duty should be imposed for the sake of revenue only, or whether he intended that it should be equivalent to protection?

The Earl of DERBY would answer the noble Earl's question by asking another. What did the noble Earl consider was a protective duty? Because he, for one, was quite unable to say when a duty ceased to become a duty for revenue and became a duty for protection. What he considered a revenue duty he also considered a protective duty; and his opinion was, that any duty they could impose for the purpose of revenue was to some extent a protective duty, though the exact amount of protection must of course be measured by the amount of the duty. In principle the two duties were the same, though in the details they might be different; and he was desirous of placing a duty upon the importation of foreign corn, not for the purpose of revenue alone, but for the purpose of revenue combined with the correlative object of protection.

The Earl of HARROWBY protested against a doctrine which had been laid down by the noble Earl at the head of the Colonial-office, relative to the discussion of foreign affairs. It was of the highest importance that both individuals, as well as the press, should always enjoy the privilege of discussing the acts of foreign powers, so long as they did so temperately; and he certainly did think expressions had fallen from noble Earls on both sides of the House tending to deny that right. They were accustomed there, as elsewhere, to hear the acts of the Emperors of Austria and Russia discussed with freedom; and why should they not exercise the same privilege in reference to the doings of other foreign powers? It would be a dangerous thing if they were now for the first time to lay it down that people in this country must not discuss the subject of foreign affairs; and he hoped that opinion would be withdrawn for the sake of removing the bad example which would otherwise seem to be held out to other nations not quite so liberal as our own.

Earl GREY confessed that the language he had used, which had been repeated to him by a learned friend, went a great deal further than he intended. Both the press and the Parliament of this country had a perfect right to discuss with temperance the acts of foreign powers, and he never intended to deny that right. What he intended to do was, to deprecate any intemperate discussion upon the acts of foreign Governments, upon which, after all, we may seem to have been ill-informed.

The Earl of MALMESBURY felt, with the noble Earl who had reverted to this subject, the value of a free press, and that was one of the reasons why he regretted the language which had been addressed to France by some of these newspapers.

The Address was then put, and agreed to, and their Lordships adjourned, at nine o'clock, until Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The House was opened at noon, and the members began to drop in immediately afterwards. Before half-past twelve fifty or sixty members were present, and by one o'clock nearly a hundred, examining every part of the magnificent apartment, and scrutinising and criticising the various fittings, useful and ornamental, and interchanging the greetings usual at the opening of a session—greetings often not the less cordial, apparently, on account of the most decided differences in political opinion.

With respect to the aspect of the House, the various decorations, which were incomplete at the close of the last session, have been perfected during the recess; some lamps of very elegant design have been suspended from the ceiling; the Speaker has got a new chair of oak, tastefully carved; the galleries for members and visitors have undergone some desirable alterations, and the chamber generally has an appearance of elegance and beauty, from which the only drawback is that which is occasioned by the lowness of the roof, which, however, conduces much to the facility of hearing.

The Speaker entered the House before two o'clock, prayers were forthwith read, and soon after the process of making out the lists by ballot of the members to accompany the Speaker to the Lords commenced, the names being drawn from the box by the chief clerk, and written down by the second clerk as he read them. This process took so much time, that it was scarcely concluded when Mr. Pulman, the deputy usher, arrived, and summoned the House in the usual terms to the House of Lords. The deputy usher having retired, the Speaker, who sat at the chief clerk's seat, arose, and walked out, attended by the serjeant and the chief clerk. The members all remained quietly standing in their places, even after the Speaker had left the House (in striking contrast to the unseemly rush which we had been wont to witness), while the second clerk proceeded to read over the names from the list which had been made out for the purpose. So long had the reading of the names occupied, that not many minutes elapsed after the last member left the House when the Speaker reappeared; and having taken the chair pro formâ, and made the usual announcement of a "gracious Speech," the House adjourned for a short time.

The House resumed at a quarter to four o'clock.

NEW MEMBERS.

Mr. Milligan (for Bradford), Capt. Duncombe (for the East Riding of Yorkshire), Mr. Hardinge (for Downpatrick), and Sir J. Emerson Tennent (for Lisburn), took the oaths and their respective seats.

NEW WRITS.

On the motion of Mr. HATTER, it was ordered that new writs be issued for the following places:—East Retford, in the room of Mr. Arthur Duncombe; the county of Perth, in the room of the Right Hon. Fox Maule, appointed to the office of President of the Board of Control; Northampton, in the room of the Right Hon. Vernon Smith, appointed to the office of Secretary at War; Kinsale, in the room of Mr. B. Hawes, who has accepted the office of Steward of the Chiltern Hundreds; Greenwich, in the room of Rear-Admiral Dundas; and East Kent, in the room of Mr. Plumptre.

ORDER OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.—THE REFORM BILL.

Mr. HATTER said, that, as it was desirable that the House should be apprised of the order in which the Government proposed to take some of the more important measures which they intended to introduce, he had been authorised to make the following announcement:—On Monday, the 9th of February, the noble Lord at the head of the Government would move for leave to bring in a bill to extend the right of voting, and to amend the laws relating to the parliamentary representation of the people. (Hear, hear.) On Friday, the 13th, the noble Lord would move for leave to bring in a bill to amend the laws relating to the local militia; on the same day the President of the Board of Trade would move for leave to bring in a bill to carry into effect certain provisions contained in the treaty between the [illegible] on the subject of copyright; on the 10th, the house [illegible] would move for leave to bring in a bill to remedy certain abuses in the Customs [illegible] (Hear, hear); and on the same day the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department would move for leave to bring in a bill to exclude the borough of St. Alban's from the privilege of sending burgesses to represent it in Parliament. (Cheers.)

CLANDESTINE OUTLAWRY BILL.

This bill was brought in by Mr. Hayter, and laid upon the table.

At half-past four o'clock Lord Palmerston entered the House, and took his seat on the front bench beyond the gangway, on the Ministerial side, close to where Mr. Roebuck usually sits. He was warmly received by several hon. members. Lord J. Russell entered shortly afterwards, and as he proceeded up the House Mr. Feargus O'Connor ran over, and, to the utter astonishment of the noble Lord, shook him earnestly by the hand, amidst the laughter of the crowded benches.

DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS.

The SPEAKER observed that at an earlier period of the day the House had been summoned to the House of Lords, where they had had the satisfaction of hearing her Majesty deliver a most gracious Speech from the Throne. For the sake of greater accuracy, he had procured a copy of that Speech, and he would do himself the honour of reading it to the House. The right hon. gentlemen then read the Royal Speech, for which see Lords' report.

Sir RICHARD B. W. BULKELEY then rose and moved the adoption of the Address. During the period he had sat in Parliament he had seen the most cherished institutions of the country improved and strengthened. The Throne never stood firmer in the affections of the people; the Church of England had been greatly extended; the revenues more equally divided; education had been reduced to something like a system; commerce had been extended, and monopoly abolished. The country had been preserved from European wars, and blessed with domestic tranquillity; and, above all, the condition of the people had been greatly improved. All these beneficial changes he attributed to the sound policy and enlightened views of a reformed Ministry. Alverting to our foreign relations, the hon. Baronet remarked that it was impossible for England not to sympathise with other countries struggling for liberty; and to the unfortunate of all nations it was England's duty and privilege to extend an asylum. Should remonstrances be made against such protection and hospitality, they must be disregarded, let the remonstrants be who they may. Beyond that point, however, this country must not go. While admitting the propriety of enlarging and strengthening the national defences, he could not sympathise with that alarm which had been expressed for the safety of our country. To him it appeared preposterous that a nation which six weeks ago deemed herself the mistress of the sea should be so seized with a panic about the invasion of her shores. The hon. Baronet proceeded to express his satisfaction at the announcements in the Royal Speech, on the subject of the reform of the Court of Chancery and the extension of the suffrage. He concluded by reading the Address, which, as usual, was a mere echo of the Speech.

Mr. BONHAM CARTER seconded the adoption of the Address. England had long ceased to entertain hostile feelings towards other countries, but it was her duty to take care that she was in a position to hold her own. With regard to the internal prosperity of the country, it was in a satisfactory condition, as was shown by the increase which had taken place in our mercantile marine, and the state of the home market.

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATIONS.—THE FOREIGN OFFICE.

Sir B. HALL said he did not rise to oppose the Address, but in the present aspect of foreign affairs, and considering the important changes which had taken place in the Administration of the country, he thought the noble Lord was called upon to give some explanation to the House upon matters of such grave importance. He alluded to the cabal which was reported to have existed some time ago for the purpose of driving Lord Palmerston from office, and which it now appeared had at last succeeded through his policy had been approved by the House and had received by the public generally. There were circumstances connected with the retirement of Lord Palmerston that deserved great attention, as regarded [illegible] as the result of a cabal. The noble Lord's resignation or dismissal was announced in London on the 24th of December, and yet on the same day the fact of such dismissal was printed in the Breslau Gazette, and Vienna was placarded with the news by the direction of the Austrian Government. He hoped, therefore, that the noble Lord would not refuse to give the House the requisite information on the subject.

Lord J. RUSSELL: I am quite willing to answer the appeal made to me by my hon. friend. I cannot do so, however, without entering into a good deal of statement and of detail, both with respect to the particular occurrence to which my hon. friend has alluded and with respect to the state of parties. I hope, therefore, the House will give me its indulgence, that, if other topics may be referred to on which any explanations are required, I shall be allowed to offer them. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") I will now proceed to answer the questions of my hon. friend. I am entirely ready to admit that which he has stated, that in the debate of 1830, with respect to Greek affairs, I expressed the utmost confidence in the administration of foreign affairs by my noble friend. I will say more: it is not in words only that I have shown my sense of the energy, ability, and knowledge of the interests of this country in all parts of the world, which are pre-eminently the qualifications of my noble friend for that office. (Hear.) I have borne testimony otherwise than in words; and I will state that, when the Administration of 1835 was formed by Lord Melbourne, the most proceeding of Lord Melbourne was to send for me, and ask me to what office I should wish him to recommend me, and added, that he supposed the office I wished to accept was that of Foreign Secretary. My answer was, that I did not propose to take that office—that I did not propose to take that office unless it suited the convenience of my noble friend; that Lord Palmerston, who was then out of Parliament, was eminently qualified for that post, and that I was prepared to take that office if he did not. Again, when, in December, 1845, and in July, 1846, I was called upon by her Majesty to submit a plan of administration for her Majesty's sanction, I earnestly recommended to her Majesty to place Lord Palmerston in the situation of Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, as the person best qualified to hold that office. The House well knows that her Majesty was pleased to appoint him, and that from that time the noble Lord has continued to hold that situation. It was with deep regret that I found circumstances had occurred such as in my mind made it impossible for me to act any longer with my noble friend in that situation in which he had shown such distinguished ability. But before I enter into those points it is as well that I should state what I conceive to be the position which a Secretary of State holds as regards the Crown in the administration of foreign affairs, and as regards the Prime Minister of this country. With respect to the first, I should state that when the Crown, in consequence of a vote of the House of Commons, places its constitutional confidence in a Minister, that Minister is, on the other hand, bound to the Crown to the most frank and full detail of every measure that is taken, and is bound either to give a special case (as we understood) or to leave to the Crown its full liberty, a liberty which the Crown must possess, of saying that the Minister no longer possesses its confidence. Such I hold to be the general doctrine. But, as regards the noble Lord, it did so happen that in August, 1850, the precise terms were laid down in a communication on the part of her Majesty with respect to the transaction of business between the Crown and the Secretary of State. I became the organ of making that communication to my noble friend, and thus became responsible for the document I am about to read from. I shall refer only to that part of the document which has reference to the immediate subject:—

"The Queen requires, first, that Lord Palmerston will distinctly state what he proposes in a given case, in order that the Queen may know as distinctly to what she is giving her Royal sanction. Secondly, having once given her sanction to a measure, that it be not arbitrarily altered or modified by the Minister. Such an act she must consider as failing [illegible] the Crown, and justly to be visited by the exercise of her constitutional right of dismissing that Minister. She expects to be kept informed of what passes between him and the foreign Ministers before important decisions are taken based upon that intercourse; to receive the foreign despatches in good time; and to have the drafts for her approval sent to her in sufficient time to make herself acquainted with their contents before they must be sent off. The Queen thinks it best that Lord John Russell should show this letter to Lord Palmerston."

I sent that accordingly, and received a letter in which the noble Lord said:—

"I have taken a copy of this memorandum of the Queen, and will not fail to attend to the directions which it contains."

I believe those directions were entirely in conformity with the relations that exist between the Foreign Secretary and the Crown. And now I will state what is the duty of the Prime Minister, and I will state it not in my own words, but in words used by Sir R. Peel, with reference to the appointment of the official salaries committee. The words are:—

"Take the case of the Prime Minister. You must presume that he reads every important despatch from every foreign Court. He cannot consult with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and exercise the influence which he ought to have with respect to the conduct of foreign affairs, unless he be master of everything of real importance passing in that department."

I believe to that statement also there can be no contradiction: it lays down just principle with respect to the position of a Prime Minister, and makes him responsible for the basis [illegible] I may say, likewise, that I was informed both by her Majesty and Sir R. Peel, that Sir R. Peel had always been ready to consult and to take my advice on all matters relating to foreign affairs. Such, then, being the state of the relations which I held towards the Crown and towards my noble friend, I must say that I found the situation in which I was placed one of very great [illegible] (as we understood). When the noble Lord was first appointed Secretary for Foreign Affairs he was placed under Lord Grey, a statesman of age and experience, to whom my noble friend, then young in that office, would readily listen. When Lord Melbourne was at the head of the Government, Lord Melbourne's long intimacy and connexion with my noble friend would give him also influence with my noble friend. Without either of those advantages I certainly have found from time to time that relations have those were difficult to acquire. Sometimes I felt great responsibility. I will now refer to events which occurred in the autumn of last year. There was a meeting of the Cabinet on the 2nd of November, and I happen to have my memory more impressed with what I stated on that occasion, having in that instance only taken a note of what my own statements were. (Cries of "Speak out.") I stated that I thought the situation of Europe was exceedingly critical; that I thought we were on the verge [illegible] as in 1848 (and there I was mistaken)—of seeing either what is called social democracy triumphant in other countries [illegible] absolute power, on the other hand, prevail. I said that in either case the situation of England would be one of some peril; that we could not expect that a social democratic republic in France would observe the faith of treaties or refrain from attacking our allies. I said, on the other hand, that if absolute power should prevail, there was a danger, this country being an exception in the form of its government from other countries of Europe, that there might be combinations on the subject of refugees [illegible] which this country, with its notions of [illegible] which it has always maintained, could not consent to. I stated that, in [illegible] state of affairs, it was [illegible] our duty to observe strict neutrality. (Hear, hear.) I [illegible] against giving any just cause of [illegible] would be to exert the utmost [illegible] (Hear, hear.) I think my colleagues generally, and my noble friend in particular, entirely concurred [illegible] to the course which I proposed to the Cabinet on the subject, but there was a general understanding as to the desirableness of adopting such a course. Now, it happened, as I think too unfortunately, a very short time after the events of the 2d of December had taken place, that my noble friend had received at the Foreign-office deputations from certain districts of the metropolis presenting to him addresses containing terms of a most offensive nature to the Sovereign of Europe. (Hear, hear.) I was fully persuaded at the time, and I still fully persuade my noble friend had not exercised due caution in that respect—that although he had not taken the precaution of seeing those addresses at the time they were presented to him, and although he had not taken the further precaution when the deputations came into his room at the Foreign-office of taking care that his words were accurately reported, yet I was entirely persuaded that my noble friend had fallen into an error that, wholly from oversight, arising from the quantity of business with which he had to deal. I was persuaded, likewise, that there were great misrepresentations with respect to the words which my noble friend had used in reply to those addresses. I was ready, therefore, and I declared it at once, to adopt with my noble friend the whole responsibility of his conduct on that occasion, although I could not forbear seeing that an error had been committed. I did hope that after that my noble friend would have treated me with that fairness to which I think I was entitled; that he would take no important step—that he would make no important communication to foreign Ministers, without giving me information, without enabling me to give an opinion upon any step taken; in short, without that full and complete communication to which Sir Robert Peel alluded. The next transaction which occurred is that from which the whole of this unfortunate circumstance has arisen. It has relation to the events which took place in France on the 2d of December last. On the 3d of December a despatch was received from the Marquis of Normanby containing a question as to the diplomatic relations which were to be maintained by him with the Government of the President of France. A meeting of the Cabinet was held on the subject, and there existed a generally prevailing opinion among its members that the Government of this country had nothing more to do than to abstain from any interference whatever with the internal affairs of France. (Cheers.) My noble friend entirely represented the views of the Government in this respect in the following despatch:—

"Foreign-office, Dec 5, 1851.

"My Lord,—I have received and laid before the Queen your Excellency's despatch No 365, of the 3d inst., requesting to be furnished with instructions for your guidance in the present state of affairs in France. I am commanded by her Majesty to instruct your Excellency to make no change in your relations with the French Government. It is her Majesty's desire that nothing should be done by her Ambassador at Paris which could wear the appearance of an interference of any kind in the internal affairs of France. I am, &c., PALMERSTON."

There was this solemn and formal decision of her Majesty's Government, approved of by the Queen, communicated to her ambassador at Paris, and, as I conceived, carried out in the following manner. What was to be pursued by the English Government, whether here or at Paris.

Mr. GOULBURN: What is the date of that despatch?

Lord J. RUSSELL: It is dated the 5th. It was sent to her Majesty on the 6th, it came to Paris on the 7th, and arrived in Paris at five days afterwards, among the despatches from the Foreign-office which came to my hands, there was one from the Marquis of Normanby to Viscount Palmerston, dated December 6, 1851, and which was received December 8. The despatch ran thus:—

"Paris, Dec. 6, 1851.

"My Lord,—I this morning received your Lordship's despatch No. 400, of yesterday's date, and I afterwards called on M. Turgot, and informed him that I had received her Majesty's commands to say that I need make no change in my relations with the French Government in consequence of what had passed. I added, that if there had been some little delay in making this communication, it arose from material circumstances not connected with any doubt on the subject M. Turgot said that delay had been of less importance, as he had two days since heard from M. Walewski that your Lordship had expressed to him your entire approbation of the act of the President, and your conviction that he could not have acted otherwise than he had done. I said I had no knowledge of any such communication, and no instructions beyond our invariable rule, to do nothing which should have the appearance of interfering in any way in the internal affairs of France, but that I had often had an opportunity of showing, under very varied circumstances, that, whatever might be the Government here, I attached the utmost importance to maintaining the most amicable relations between the two countries. I added that I was sure, had the Government known of the suppression of the insurrection of the Rouges at the time I had heard from them, I should have been commissioned to add their congratulations to mine. I have thought it necessary to mention what was stated about M. Walewski's despatch, because two of my colleagues here mentioned to me that the despatch containing expressions precisely to that effect had been read to them in order to show the decided opinion which England had pronounced.—I have, &c., NORMANBY."

Now, I own it did not appear to me that any serious difficulty would arise from that despatch. I wrote to my noble friend to ask an explanation of it, which I felt convinced he would be able to give, and that, without denying what had been stated with regard to the communication made by a foreign Ambassador to M. Turgot, my noble friend would have explained that he had done nothing more than stated to M. Walewski what appeared to him to be on the whole the best for the interests of France; and not that Lord Normanby was the less to be guided by the instructions which were forwarded to him by his Government, or that he was to rest entirely upon information derived from other sources; but that in all the communications with the representatives of the various Governments of Europe at Paris he was to let it be understood that the Government of England expressed no opinion with regard to the internal affairs of France. (Cheers.) I own that appears to me the only wise and the only safe course that could have been adopted. However, I have nothing—I received no information from the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs as to the meaning of this declaration at Paris that England had pronounced in favour of the act of the President. Let me here say what is the view I take of this case. If England were to allow her Foreign Secretary to pronounce an opinion of that kind, it could no longer be said that she had no interference with the internal affairs of France (Hear, hear); for in pronouncing such an opinion by her Secretary for Foreign Affairs, a moral support, a moral sanction, and a moral influence would be given and exercised in favour of the course which had been taken by the President. (Hear, hear.) Not having received any communication from my noble friend of any kind, but being at Woburn Abbey on the 13th of December, a messenger arrived, bringing to me a communication from her Majesty, making inquiries respecting the said despatch of December 6th, and asking for an explanation. The next morning (the 14th) I sent a messenger to the noble Lord, and my communication must have arrived in London at an early hour, but I received no answer from the noble Lord on that day; on the 15th I received no answer whatever. On the 16th I wrote a note by the early post to the noble Lord expressing my opinion that silence was not respectful to her Majesty, and asking for a reply. However, neither on the 16th nor on the 16th did any communication reach me, but the same disdainful silence was observed. The inquiry of the Queen as to what was the meaning of the alleged conversation between her Foreign Secretary and the Ambassador of a foreign country was left entirely unnoticed. But on the morning of the 17th I received copies of two despatches—one from the Marquis of Normanby to Lord Palmerston, and the other from Lord Palmerston to the Marquis of Normanby. The former despatch was in the following terms:—

"My Lord,—In my despatch No. 472, of the 6th instant, notifying my communication of my instructions to M. Turgot, I reported that his Excellency had mentioned that M. Walewski had written a despatch in which he stated that your Lordship had expressed your complete approbation of the course taken by the President in the recent coup d'état. I also reported that I had conveyed to M. Turgot my belief that there must be some mistake in this statement, and my reasons for that belief. But, as a week has now elapsed without any explanation from your Lordship on this point, I must conclude M. Walewski's report to have been substantially correct. That being the case, I am perfectly aware that it is beyond the sphere of my present duties to make any remark upon the acts of your Lordship, except inasmuch as they affect my own position. But within these limits I must, with due deference, be permitted to observe, that if your Lordship, as Foreign Minister, thought fit to express yourself in language such as is described in it, without giving me any intimation that you had done so, prescribing afterwards a different course to me, namely, the avoidance of any appearance of interference of any kind in the internal affairs of France, that may deem best, without continually referring himself to the Crown. But, in a matter which was of the utmost importance—namely, the influence and the moral support of England to the act of the President of the French Republic—it seemed to me a measure so grave, that the opinion not only of the Prime Minister but of the Cabinet should have been taken, and that no such question should have been decided upon without their interference, and without the sanction of the Crown. (Cheers.) What was the act to which that despatch referred? It is a question, certainly, of the utmost delicacy; but it is, nevertheless, one upon which I cannot refrain from saying a few words. The act of the President was not merely that of dissolving the Assembly; it was an act which, in the first place, dissolved that Assembly, and put an end to the existing constitution; it was an act, in the next place, which anticipated the elections of 1852, which were to take place according to that constitution, but with respect to which great apprehensions had been entertained. In the third place, it was an act putting an end to Parliamentary government in France—(Hear, hear)—an act which, together with Parliamentary government, suspended the right of freedom of speech and the freedom of the press, which are considered the usual accompaniments of Parliamentary government. I am not going to enter into any dispute whether that was a fit thing to be done; that was entirely a question for the French people themselves to decide (Hear.) The French people might say, that their history entitled them to say, that what we call in England Parliamentary government has produced such evils in France, that [illegible] the State, and is so incompatible with the peace of society in that country, that it ought at once to be abolished, and a different system established in its place. If the French nation choose to say that, who has the right to say that pretence to contradict it? (Hear, hear.) But it is another question to give the moral approbation of England—to place the broad seal of England upon that doctrine with respect to so great a question. If France has so resolved, let us acquiesce in that decision. I shall do nothing to prevent it. I may lament that those great qualities of human nature which are brought out by Parliamentary government, by free discussion, and by a free press, and those great qualities could not Lenceforth have full development and display. But with respect to our position, it was to be remembered that during the existence of the present Administration, with my noble friend as its organ, we have given the moral support and the moral sympathy of England to constitutional government. We have done so in Spain, we have done so in Portugal, we have done so in Piedmont; and none was more ready than your Majesty's noble friend to impart that moral influence. But if we were at once to side with a deviation from constitutional government, and to give our sanction to the act of the President of France, how can we tell any other country that we advise them to continue Parliamentary government? It therefore appeared to me a departure, a signal and wide departure, from that policy which the Government had supported and pursued, and which my noble friend had especially advocated. When this took place—when, as I conceived, the authority of the Queen had been set aside—it appeared to me that I had no other course than to inform my noble friend, that he, while I held office, could no longer hold the seals as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Later in the day, and after I had formed that resolution, I received a long letter from my noble friend, stating the reasons why he approved of the act of the President of France. But it appeared to me that those reasons no longer touched the question. The question then was, whether the Secretary of State was entitled, of his own authority, to write a despatch as the organ of the Queen's Government, in which his colleagues had never concurred, and to which the Queen had never given her Royal sanction? It appeared to me, that, without degrading the Crown, I could not advise her Majesty to retain that Minister in the Foreign department or her Government. I at the same time informed her Majesty that a correspondence had gone on between Lord Palmerston and myself with respect to the matter. That was on the Wednesday. I think; and I waited till Saturday in order to consider and to reconsider the matter before I sent the whole correspondence to the Crown. I think on Thursday I informed my noble friend I would be at home (as we understood), thinking he might propose some course by which a separation could be avoided; but nothing of the kind took place, and I, being fully resolved then as I had before been of what I should do, wrote on Saturday, the 20th, to Mr. Wyndham, the [illegible] and I waited till Saturday in order important or not, not as the organ of the Government, but an opinion which he had formed himself at the moment, then such a restriction on the intercourse with foreign Ministers would be extremely injurious and prejudicial to the public service. (Hear, hear.) Now, I expressed this opinion to which the noble Lord has referred to the French Ambassador on the 31 of December; but was I the only member of the Cabinet who did thus express an opinion on passing events? (Hear, hear.) I am informed that on the evening of that very day, and under the same roof as I expressed my opinion, the noble Lord at the head of the Government, in conversation with the same Ambassador, expressed his opinion. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) I cannot tell what that opinion was, but, from what has just now fallen from the noble Lord this evening, it may be assumed that that opinion was not very different even from the reported opinion which I am supposed to have expressed. (Cheers.) Was that all? On the Friday, and in the noble Lord's own house, I have been informed that the French Ambassador met the noble Lord the President of the Council and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. (Loud cries of "Hear.") The noble Lord again expressed an opinion (Hear, hear); and the President of the Council and the Chancellor of the Exchequer also expressed an opinion (Cheers and laughter): and be it remembered, that the charge was not the nature of the opinion, for the noble Lord distinctly told me, "You mistake the question between us; it is not whether the President was justified or not, but whether you were justified in expressing an opinion on the matter at all." (Hear, hear.) I believe that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Colonies did also in those few days express an opinion on those events, and I have been informed also that the then Vice-President of the Board of Trade, and now the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, also expressed his opinion. (Cheers and laughter.) Then it follows that every member of the Cabinet, whatever his political avocations may have been—however much his attention may have been devoted to other matters—is at liberty to express an opinion of passing events; but the Secretary of State for the Foreign Affairs, whose peculiar duty it is to watch those events, who is unfit for his office if he has not an opinion on them, is the only man not permitted to express an opinion ("Hear," and laughter); and when a foreign Minister comes and tells him that he has news, he is to remain silent, like a speechless idol, the mute of some Eastern Pacha? (Cheers and laughter.) Now I am told, "It is not your conversation with M. Walewski that is complained of, but your despatch to the Marquis of Normanby." What had I stated in that despatch, in reference to which a great parade was made, as if I had been guilty of breach of duty to the Crown? [Lord J. RUSSELL: To the Prime Minister, in sending it without previously communicating with the noble Lord? (Hear.) No man can lay down the matter more strongly than I have in reference to the obligations of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. I have always admitted that if the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has an opinion to express to an Ambassador abroad, without ascertaining the opinion of the Prime Minister or the Crown, he is guilty of a breach of duty. But there are many cases in which it is perfectly well known that he is only expressing the opinion of the Government, and inconvenience might arise from delay. There are many cases in which a sedulous and careful observance of the strict rule is attended with inconvenience to the public service, and has exposed me to imputations of neglect and delay in answering the despatches I received. But what was the despatch from the Marquis of Normanby, and what was my answer? Lord Normanby, in his despatch of the 31st, said that the French Minister had reported that I used certain expressions which Lord Normanby represents as inconsistent with the instructions not to interfere in the internal affairs of France. Now, if those expressions had been used, I do not see that they are inconsistent with the instructions not to make any alteration in our relations with the French Government. But what does Lord Normanby proceed to state? He says, that after making that communication to M. Turgot to which the noble Lord has alluded, to do nothing which should have the appearance of interfering in any way in the internal affairs of France, he added that he was quite sure that if the Governments had known the events of Paris on the Thursday and Friday they would have joined their congratulations to his. That was a greater apparent interference in the internal affairs of the French nation than any conversation of mine with M. Walewski. However, Lord Normanby having reported the expressions of the French Minister to me, I did not think it necessary to go into any explanation on the subject; but ten days afterwards, on the 15th of December, the Ambassador at Paris, rather inverting, I think, the positions of Ambassador and Secretary of State ("Hear, hear," and a laugh), calls on the Secretary of State to give him an explanation as to the language the Secretary of State was supposed to have used to M. Walewski. In my despatch, in answer, I repeated that neither the Secretary of State nor the Ambassador at Paris was entitled to pronounce judgment on the affairs of France; but I stated the nature of the opinions I expressed on the 31 of December. Therefore, it is a misrepresentation of the facts of the case, to say that in answering Lord Normanby's letter, I was giving instructions inconsistent with the relation of our general intercourse with the French Government. It was no instruction. I did not give the opinion of the Government or of England. It was my own opinion; and, whether right or wrong, it was shared by numbers in France. Therefore, the charge which the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) has brought against me, founded on a despatch, has no foundation in justice or in fact. (Hear, hear.) That is the state of the case as between the noble Lord and myself. As for the letter of the noble Lord, giving reasons for advising the Queen to appoint a successor to me, that was a step which it was perfectly competent for the noble Lord to take without assigning any reason to me. But he chose to assign a reason, and that reason was, that I did, in conversation with M. Walewski, that which he and other divers members of the Cabinet appear also to have done in conversation with the same person. (Hear.) I do not dispute the right of the noble Lord to remove any member of the Government whom he may think it better to remove than to retain in the Cabinet. With respect to myself, the noble Lord has done no injustice by saying that the course of foreign policy of which I was the instrument had received too constant support and approval of the sense of Parliament. I think that course of foreign policy was the proper one for this country to pursue. (Hear, hear.) I always thought it was the duty of the Government of this country to make the interests of England the polar star to guide our course (Cheers), and that it was my duty to be, as the noble Lord describes me in 1850, neither the Minister of France, nor of Russia, nor of Prussia, but the Minister of England. (Cheers.) I have felt it my duty to maintain the interests of England, to afford protection to British subjects abroad in all parts of the world, to protect their commerce, their persons, and their property. (Hear, hear.) It is not to be expected that, in pursuing that course, the giving that encouragement which our own disposition and wishes stimulated us to give to the progressive diffusion of constitutional government in other countries—it is not to be expected, I repeat, that such a course could be pursued without meeting with opposition from persons and Governments who either aimed opposite opinions, or who have happened to be wrongdoers, from whom redress might be demanded. But I am happy to say, and my statement is confirmed by what has just fallen from the noble Lord, that, after having for a considerable time had the good fortune and honour to be the instrument to guide the foreign relations of this country, I have left the country in a state of most friendly relations with respect to every part of Europe, and that there is no question, no political question of any importance, creating a difference between this and any country. (Cheers.) It is not always that that could have been said. There have been periods when, unfortunately, differences existed; but, at all events, the "firebrand," as I have been called, that individual was embroiled the relations of England with all other countries, as it has been said by me, after having found the country involved in difficulties, left office with no question of differences between this and other nations, but with amity subsisting between this and all other countries. (Cheers.) For instance, there are our relations with Russia. The time has been when we have had serious differences with that power. But between England and Russia there now exists the most cordial understanding upon the very questions on which formerly differences prevailed—namely, with regard to Persia and Turkey. A short time ago, questions arose in which Prussia was concerned, which seriously affected the peace of the north of Germany, and which we succeeded in arranging; and it was some satisfaction to her Majesty's Government, that, by our conduct in according the proper and just pretensions of Denmark, we succeeded in wiping out the recollections of former differences which had embittered the relations of those two countries, and that we were enabled to establish between England and Denmark relations of the most friendly and confidential nature. (Hear, hear.) Sir, no one will be prepared to underrate the importance of this consideration, that, whatever may have been the nature of the Government in France of late years, the nations of France and Great Britain have remained upon terms of the most complete friendship and good understanding. (Hear, hear.) During all the changes which took place in France during the year 1848, whoever was at the head of the Government, and whatever form of government was adopted by the French nation, we abstained from all interference with the internal affairs of France. Our principle has been to treat the authorities of the moment as the Government of the French nation, and with those authorities our relations have always been those of cordial amity. (Hear, hear.) Then, with regard to the United States. The United States constitute a power between which and this country in former years the most serious difficulties existed. But these countries are now upon a more cordial footing, and a better understanding prevails between them than has ever before prevailed between those two great and kindred powers. (Hear.) This is a state of things which I must say is very much owing to the abilities and conciliatory manners of our late Minister to the United States, Sir Henry Bulwer, and very much also to the manly, straightforward, frank, and conciliatory character that distinguished person who represents the United States at this Court. (Cheers.) Well, Sir, with the Spanish states of America our normal condition, I may almost say, has been that of demanding redress for injuries done to British subjects. But these points of dispute are now either settled or in a train of adjustment; and our relations with those states are as good as (if not better than) ever we have a right are likely to be. (Hear, hear.) I come now to Brazil. With Brazil we are now co-operating with the great object of the suppression of the slave trade. That object has been attained with such success, that, whereas in former years the number of slaves imported into Brazil had been 54,000, 16,000, and 17,000, the number of slaves brought during the last year was less than 3000, of which a certain number were seized by the Government for the purposes of emancipation. (Hear, hear.) And, Sir, if the measures now in co operation between England and Brazil, and the measures now being taken upon the coast of Africa are well and unanimously followed out, the people of this country will in a short time have the satisfaction of accomplishing the great and noble object which for so great a length of time has been the aim at which they have directed their efforts. (Cheers.) I do not think the people of England desire the suppression of the slave trade because they believe they will gain thereby in reputation and renown, because it is not to gain reputation and renown that those sacrifices have been made and those exertions have been continued. (Cheers.) They have desired the extinction of the slave traffic, not for fame, but for "virtue's better end;" and the people of this country, whenever that great object is accomplished, will look for their reward, not to the tongues of men, but to the dispensing award of a just and retributive Providence. (Cheers.) I now come to Spain. Our relations with Spain are now more cordial than they ever have been, notwithstanding our recent differences with that power. With the states of Italy we have had questions relative to losses sustained by individuals, but these have been settled in the most satisfactory manner. With Turkey our relations have been perfectly amicable. Austria is, perhaps, the only power with which our relations have not been quite so cordial as in some former periods of our history. But with Austria, so far as Government and diplomatic relations are concerned, we are upon friendly terms. With regard to Austria, I must observe, however, that great differences of opinion and principle have existed between the English and Austrian Governments. England has supported the diffusion of constitutional government, whilst the Austrian Government, on the contrary, has preserved the despotic system. In Portugal, Sicily, and the north of Italy, the two Governments were at variance in their opinions, and also in their views upon some difficult internal questions, and upon the action of Turkey with regard to the treatment of the refugees from the Hungarian territory. But these differences ceased for the reason why the British and Austrian Governments should not co-operate with each other upon any matter on which our opinions and our interests may agree. (Hear, hear.) Why, Sir, England and Austria had differences with each other in the years 1834, 1835, 1836, and 1837, with regard to the affairs of Portugal and Spain, but that did not prevent co-operating with them in 1840; and when we found that their objects and views were identical with our own. (Hear, hear.) And whatever irritation may have been introduced, and whatever differences of policy may have existed, that irritation was sure to subside; and I am therefore justified in recalling Austria among the countries with whom we have satisfactory relations of friendship and interest. Sir, having conducted the affairs of this country through periods of considerable difficulty, it was my good fortune to be the instrument of peace, and to combine therewith the not unsuccessful assertion of the interests of England. (Hear, hear.) And I think I may say, in quitting office, I have handed over the foreign relations of the country to my successor with the honour and dignity of England unsullied, and leaving her character and reputation standing high among the nations of the world. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. Muntz said he had, like many others, received and entertained Kossuth because he was an ill-used man, who had exerted himself for his country, and it never once entered into his head to receive him because he was a Republican.

Mr. Baillie said, after the explanations which they had heard, he could come to no other conclusion than that Lord Palmerston had been offered up as a sacrifice for the whole Government.

Mr. Geach said he had not entertained Kossuth because he was a Republican, nor had he ever heard him ask for intervention. On the contrary, he had condemned intervention, which had been the cause of the destruction of the liberties of his own country.

Mr. M. Milnes regretted the policy of Lord Palmerston, and, as an humble supporter of the Government, regretted that it had so weakened itself by its summary dismissal from office.

Lord Dudley Stuart said he thought that the nobility and gentry of England did themselves no credit by hanging back, as they had done, when Kossuth was so enthusiastically received by the great mass of the people.

After a few words from Sir H. Verney,

Mr. B. Osborne, in reference to the paragraph of the Speech respecting Ireland, suggested that in the disturbed districts in Ireland the police system of Sir Robert Peel should be introduced, according to which the locality of the jury might give the verdict.

Mr. Roebuck contended that the Government, now deprived of its right arm in the loss of Lord Palmerston, had nothing left in it to entitle it to ask for the confidence of the House. The hon. gentleman referred to the misdemeanours of the Administration in the colonies, and other departments of the administration, in order to establish beyond doubt the want of capacity in those who presided over them.

Mr. Naples dwelt upon the confederacy existing in Ireland against life and property, and urged upon the Government the necessity of taking stringent measures to suppress Ribbon societies in Ireland.

Mr. E. B. Roche could not consent to again resort to the system of coercion, however he might deplore the murders which at once affected and disgraced his country. Those murders were attributable entirely to land [illegible], which the Government had always shirked and avoided.

Mr. Disraeli said he had listened with great attention to the explanations given that night; but he must say, that he could derive but little information from either of the noble Lords. He had always felt it his duty to object to the policy of the noble Lord who had been removed from office; but he had never separated the policy of the Foreign Secretary from that of the Cabinet. As that policy was, he believed, still to be pursued, he would rather it should be pursued by the noble Lord, who was admitted on all hands to be a most able Minister, than by any other member of the Cabinet. With respect to the new Reform Bill to be brought forward, he felt certain that a measure of real improvement would not be opposed by any one gentleman on this side of the House; but if they were to be favoured with a bill to throw the balance of numbers on the side of any particular party in that House, or to lessen the influence of the landed gentry in the House, he would oppose it, even at the hazard of being considered opposed—which he was not—to any measure of reform whatever. He felt himself called upon to remark on the omission from the Speech of all allusion to the Ecclesiastical Titles Act—an act which no Minister would be justified in passing unless he intended to act upon it; but, although the noble Lord had made such a flourish last year about the insult offered to our Queen by the Vatican, he now made no allusion to the subject, notwithstanding the conduct of the Prelates of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, as well as in this country. He also adverted to the omission of all notice of the condition of the agricultural classes; and for this omission, as well as the former one, he thought the noble Lord was bound to assign his reasons.

After a few observations from Mr. H. Grattan,

Lord J. Russell said he had communicated with the French Ambassador in consequence of what had fallen from Lord Palmerston; but that gentleman had said that he could not recollect any particular expressions made use of by him (Lord John Russell), but that he had a general impression that the result was satisfactory. With respect to the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, he believed that it had not been violated, and therefore it was unnecessary to refer to it in the Speech from the Throne. The honourable and learned member for Sheffield had charged Ministers with incapacity. He would not reply on that occasion further than to say that they would at any time bow to the declared opinion of that House; but, until the House should withdraw its confidence, they would exercise their best abilities for the benefit of the country.

After some observations from Colonel Sibthorp,

Mr. Whiteside said the arm of justice was paralysed in Ireland, and inquiry was requisite with a view to devise a remedy.

Sir G. Grey defended the Irish Government.

The Address was then agreed to, and the House adjourned at a quarter before one o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Wednesday.

The Speaker took the chair at a quarter to four o'clock.

SMITHFIELD MARKET.

Captain Fitzroy inquired whether, under the Smithfield Market Act of last session, which allowed the City six months to signify if they would undertake the new market, the corporation of London had signified such an intention?

Sir G. Grey replied that on the 29th of January, a few days before the expiration of the six months, he did receive from the corporation formal notice that they desired to undertake the new metropolitan market, and to defray all the expenses incident to it out of the corporation funds. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. J. O'Brien asked whether it would be under the present act, or some other bill?

Sir G. Grey said the act of last session gave all the powers requisite to erect the market, which powers were to be transferred to the corporation in case they gave the notice referred to; and he was not aware whether another measure would be necessary for that purpose. He could not say, however, whether an act might not be necessary in order to procure a site for the market.

THE COLONIES.—THE KAFFIR WAR.

Sir W. Molesworth gave notice that he should, so soon as the papers upon the subject were produced, call the attention of the House to the state of the British dominions in South Africa, and move resolutions respecting it.

MONEY VOTES.

On the motion that the usual sessional orders be agreed to,

Mr. Hume complained of the practice of voting away money after twelve o'clock at night; and moved, as an amendment, that after that hour no vote of public money should be brought forward.

After a short conversation the House divided, and the amendment was negatived by a majority of 146 to 64.

THE KITCHEN.

Mr. Stafford then moved that a standing committee be appointed to control the arrangements of the kitchen and refreshment rooms in the department of the Serjeant-at-Arms attending this House; to consist of Lord Marcus Hill, Mr. Mackenzie, Mr. Dawson, Mr. Alderman Humphery, and Mr. Stafford—three to be a quorum.

Mr. F. French objected to some of the charges made for refreshments. He did not think hon. members ought to be charged 6s. a bottle for sherry. (A laugh.) The hon. member for Southwark had been told by the first merchant in London, that he would supply any kind of wine at more reasonable prices. The charges ought to be so reduced as that hon. members might be induced to dine at Belamy's instead of at their clubs.

Mr. Anstey suggested that this culinary question should be discussed in the proposed committee, and, in the meantime, he would propose an alteration in the constitution of the committee. Last year the Earl of Arundel and Surrey was on the committee, and now it was proposed to substitute for him the name of Mr. Dawson. As, however, on fasting days it was probable that Roman Catholic members might suffer somewhat in the hands of their Protestant providers, he proposed that Mr. Serjeant Murphy—a good Catholic, a liberal, and a first-rate table companion—should be nominated in the place of Mr. Dawson. (Laughter.)

After a few words from Mr. French and Mr. Stafford,

Mr. Anstey gave notice that he would move the addition of Mr. Serjeant Murphy's name to the committee.

Lord M. Hill then stood forward, carte in hand, and proceeded, amid general laughter, to justify the reasonableness of its charges. A portion of soup could be had for 1s., and mutton broth and a chop followed for 6d. (Laughter). Soles were 1s., and a whiting 6d.; turbot and cod fish were to be had for 1s. 6d., and salmon and lobster sauce for 2s. (Laughter). To come to more substantial items: a cutlet was to be had for 6d.; and if hon. gentlemen did not like to pay 6s. a bottle for sherry, they could have it as low as 4s. In tea and coffee he feared no reduction could be made. (Laughter.)

The motion was then agreed to.

The sessional orders, including that which prescribes the hours of session for the House on Wednesdays to be from 12 o'clock at noon to 6 o'clock P.M., were then agreed to.

VENTILATION OF THE HOUSE.

On the bringing up of the report on the Address, in answer to the Speech from the Throne,

Mr. Hume strongly complained of the construction and ventilation of the House. The latter was so bad, that on the previous evening he was obliged to quit it, owing to the excessive heat, and was too ill to return. He thought, after all the money which had been spent on the Houses of Parliament, they were entitled to a house in which they could assemble without prejudice to their health.

Mr. B. Osborne also complained of the fittings of the House. On the previous day one of the candelabra fell, and went through the floor; while another of them baked, to the serious damage of the clothes of those hon. members who sat beneath it. The quarrel between Mr. Barry and Dr. Reid had now lasted five years, and the latter gentleman said that the House could never be properly ventilated until that quarrel could be adjusted. He hoped they would call Dr. Reid to give evidence at the bar of the House.

Mr. Fitzroy said the state of the House on the previous evening was intolerable, a constant stench prevailing the whole night, with alternate puffs of hot and cold air, which rendered it insupportable. He suggested the appointment of a committee to inquire into the subject.

Lord Seymour also recommended the appointment of a committee. The conversation then dropped.

REPORT ON THE ADDRESS.

The report upon the Address was agreed to, and it was ordered that such members of the House as were in the Privy Council should present the Address to her Majesty.

Mr. Hume asked, if there was any objection to lay upon the table a copy of any reports which had been made respecting changes in the Royal Mint?

Mr. G. Lewis said there was no objection.

Adjourned at half-past six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday.

CRIME IN IRELAND.

The Marquis of Westmeath called the attention of her Majesty's Government to the painful state of certain parts of Ireland, and also to the failure of the special commission that had been recently appointed to try a number of offenders. He wished to know whether the Government intended to take a new view of the subject, and whether it was intended to strengthen the law for the repression of crime and outrage?

EARL GREY understood the question to be, whether, in consequence of the failure of the Special Commission, the Government intended to introduce any measure for the alteration of the law. The proceedings of that Commission had only just terminated, and he had not yet communicated with the Secretary of State for the Home Department; no decision on the subject had, therefore, yet been come to.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

Lord LYNDHURST wished to know whether the Bill for the amendment of the practice of the Court of Chancery, to be brought into the other House on Monday week, would carry into effect fully and completely the recommendations of the Commissioners?

The LORD CHANCELLOR said the notice given applied to a measure which would undoubtedly carry out the recommendations of the Commission; but, until he had seen the bill fully drawn out, he could not say whether he would be fully authorised to recommend its adoption. That bill would go to the practice, but not to the jurisdiction of the Court; but there would be another bill laid on the table on Friday night to carry out the other objects contemplated.

Lord BROUGHAM expressed his gratification that these measures would be be brought on so soon, as nothing more important could be brought under the consideration of Parliament. In the main recommendations of that Commission he most entirely concurred, and he hoped it would pave the way for the abolition of the Masters in the Court of Chancery.

THE QUEEN'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

The Marquis of WESTMINSTER stated, that, in obedience to the commands of the Houses, the Lords with white staves had waited upon the Queen with an answer to her Majesty's Address, and had been most graciously received. The following was her Majesty's reply—"I thank you for your loyal and dutiful address, and it will be at all times my earnest desire to co-operate with you in measures calculated to promote the prosperity and happiness of my people."

THE WAR AT THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The Duke of WELLINGTON would take that opportunity of expressing his sense of the policy of Sir Harry Smith, the Commander-in-Chief of her Majesty's troops at the Cape of Good Hope. Sir Harry Smith was an officer of such high reputation in the service, that he did not require any commendation from him. But having been entrusted with a high command, and engaged in extensive military operations, and having been recalled by her Majesty's Government, it was but just to him to say that he (the Duke of Wellington), who was his commanding officer, entirely approved of all his operations, entirely approved of all the orders he gave to the troops, and of the arrangements he had made for their success. He also approved entirely of the conduct of the officers and men, and was fully sensible of the difficulties under which they laboured, and of the gallantry with which they got through them. It was his firm belief that everything was done by the General commanding and the officers under his control to carry into effect, so far as was possible, the orders of her Majesty's Government. He (the Duke of Wellington) had had the honour of conducting the command of her Majesty's army, and had superintended the conduct of different operations in the same part of the world, under three separate Governments, and he was sorry to say that he observed a palpable error in the whole of those operations, and certainly how gallantly they had acted as others had acted before him. The Kaffirs occupied extensive regions of what was called jungle or bush, but which was in reality thickset—and such thick wood could be found nowhere else. The Kaffirs retired to these fastnesses with the plunder, on which they subsisted; they were attacked at great odds, and necessarily with great loss. They moved away sometimes with their plunder, and sometimes it was taken from them. The troops, however, did not occupy these fastnesses; they could not, because they could not live in them. The moment they retired the Kaffirs returned again, and the consequence was, that, to his certain knowledge, under the last three governors, these fastnesses had been attacked three or four times over, on every occasion with great loss to the assailants. There was a remedy for that state of things: the fastnesses should be destroyed as soon as they were taken. He had experience of this kind of warfare, and he would say that the opening of roads, as had been shown from the earliest times, was the only mode of freeing the country from that description of enemy, as it would at once admit of the movement of regular troops. He would say, therefore, that it was absolutely necessary that roads should be immediately made into these fastnesses. He had communicated these opinions to the Secretary at War, and hoped they would be acted upon. The only objection that could be urged was that it required a great length of time, and would occasion no little expense. The truth was, that the war at the Cape had now come to that point, that unless such a measure was adopted there could be no peace in that part of the world—there could be no enjoyment of the social comforts of civilized life. The whole of the native population had revolted, and it could not be expected that depredations would not be carried on when Kaffir chieftains with 10,000, 20,000, or 30,000 followers had established themselves in these fastnesses within the boundaries of her Majesty's territories. The expense could not be one-tenth the cost of a single campaign; and if it was not done, and effectually done, there could be no peace in that part of the world.

In answer to Lord LYNDHURST, Earl GREY said that the papers from the Cape of Good Hope were in two sets, the one exclusively referring to the operations of the war, and the other to legislative matters and the proceedings of the Legislative Council, the number of which had recently been filled up.

The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH complained that there was at present no member of the Government to represent the Board of Control, although he had some important questions to ask relative to the proposed measures of the Government contingent upon the expiration of the East India Charter.

Earl GREY said, if the noble Earl had given notice of his questions, some member of her Majesty's Government would have been ready to reply to him.

The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH would put the questions on Tuesday next.

Lord CRANWORTH brought in a bill for the amendment of the Municipal Corporation Act.

Lord MONTAGGLE moved for returns connected with the consolidated annuities upon land in Ireland.

Lord CAMPBELL, in answer to a question from a noble Lord, said it was the intention of the Master of the Rolls early in the session to bring in a bill for the registration of assurances in Ireland.

Their Lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at four o'clock

Mr. COWAN presented a petition from Edinburgh in favour of an extension of the suffrage.

Mr. ADDERLEY presented a petition from certain inhabitants of the Cape of Good Hope, complaining that the Constitution which had been promised to them had not been carried out.

Mr. W. MILES presented a petition from a place in Somersetshire, praying that insane pauper lunatics should be placed in other than lunatic asylums.

Mr. MILES moved for returns showing the date and terms of the contract for preserved meat for the use of her Majesty's navy.—Agreed to.

In answer to a question from Mr. Whitesides, respecting the constitution of juries in Ireland, Sir W. SOMERVILLE said he hoped the question would be postponed until the Attorney-General for Ireland was in his place.

Mr. FORBES MACKENZIE obtained leave to bring in a bill for regulating public-houses in Scotland.

Mr. FRENSFIELD obtained leave to bring in a bill to consolidate and amend the statutes relating to the assessment and collection of county rates in England.

THE ADDRESS.

The answer to her Majesty's Speech from the Throne was then considered and agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. C. LEWIS it was agreed that a committee should be appointed to-morrow, to consider and report on the supplies to be granted to her Majesty.

The House then adjourned, at five minutes past five.

THE INVASION OF BRITAIN BY FRANCE:
PROJECTS AND ALARMS FROM 1792 TO 1852.

I.—EXPEDITION TO BANTRY BAY, IN 1796.

THE possible invasion of Britain by the French was spoken of on both sides of the Channel in the first year of the revolutionary war, 1793; so also in 1794. In 1795 the Directory Government threatened it emphatically. In England the threat caused little real alarm; partly because it was assumed to be published to deter Britain from sending her armies to the aid of the European monarchies, and partly because the aggressive energy of the Republican armies was yet unlevelloped.

In 1796 preparations were made at Brest for nine months to send out a naval and military force to effect a revolution in Ireland. From various causes the armament was not ready before the middle of December; or, if ready, it was delayed, in hope of making the passage of the Channel under cover of a fog. It consisted of twenty-five ships of the line, fifteen frigates, besides brigs, sloops of war, and transports. The army consisted of 25,000 men, and was commanded by General Hoche, an officer who had been successful in subduing the loyalists of La Vendée. They sailed on the 18th of December. On going out of Brest, some of the largest ships struck upon the rocks, and became unfit for service in that expedition. On the 19th a violent storm arose; it dispersed and damaged several of the ships. On the 24th Admiral Bouvet anchored, with seven ships of the line and ten others, in Bantry Bay, in the county of Cork, Ireland. A boat was despatched to the shore with a party to reconnoitre; but it was captured, and on the beach numbers of people appeared to oppose a landing.

After lying some days in that bay, the violence of the weather, which had never abated to moderation, increased so much that the Admiral resolved to leave his unsafe anchorage and proceed to sea. The officers of the land forces insisted on his awaiting the expected appearance of Hoche, who, with other superior officers, was in a frigate which separated from the fleet on the night of the 16th, immediately after leaving Brest; or, that he would land the troops, that they might at once begin the campaign. But the Admiral refused to comply, alleging that General Hoche alone possessed the plan of the expedition. He accordingly set sail for Brest, where he arrived on the 31st; the other divisions of the fleet reached that harbour also, with the exception of two ships of the line and three frigates. One of the ships and two frigates foundered at sea; one frigate was captured by the English; and the other ship only escaped capture by being run ashore near Brest harbour, where she became a wreck.

Thus, notwithstanding the superior navy of England, Ireland was only saved from a very formidable invasion by the assistance of the wintry elements. The address of General Hoche to his army before leaving Brest proved that he contemplated Ireland only as the readiest means of invading England. He told his soldiers that they were to treat the Irish as friends, and not as a conquered people; and that they were republicans, and were ripe for revolution.

II.—INVASION OF DEVONSHIRE AND WALES BY THE FRENCH, IN 1797.

During the month of January, 1797, the ships and regiments which had returned from Bantry Bay were reformed by repairs and by additions of men and stores, to renew the expedition. The middle of February came, however, and it was still delayed. On the 18th of February a corps of about 1400 men (some accounts say 1200) was embarked at Brest in four vessels, three of them frigates. On the 20th they entered the Bristol Channel, and anchored in the harbour of Ilfracomb, on the north coast of Devonshire. They scuttled several merchantmen, and probably would have destroyed all the shipping there had they not been apprised that a body of troops was marching against them. This was the North Devon Regiment of Volunteers, commanded by Colonel Orchard.

Leaving Ilfracomb, they stood over to the headlands off St. David, in Pembrokeshire, and anchored in a bay near Fishguard. Here they disembarked, but with great difficulty. Being unacquainted with the country, they went ashore at a place defended by rugged rocks, which they were obliged to climb with much labour.

On the 23d, their whole force being landed, they advanced into the country, expecting, it is said, to be joined by English revolutionists. But of these none appeared. The inhabitants (a mingling of Welsh and English) gathered from all parts of the country, for many miles round, to receive them as a gallant enemy was bound to be received. In the course of the day 3000 men were collected, all armed with such weapons as came readiest to hand. Amongst them were 700 well-trained militia. Lord Cawdor put himself at their head, and marched directly against the invaders. But, instead of attempting either attack or defence, the French commander entered into a treaty, conveyed by an officer, that the circumstances under which the French troops had landed rendered military operations unnecessary. He said such operations would only lead to bloodshed and pillage, and that the officers under him had intimated their desire to negotiate for a surrender.

To this message Lord Cawdor replied by requiring them to surrender immediately as prisoners of war. This they did the following day. They had no artillery, but had a quantity of powder and ball sufficient to load seventy carts. About half of them were veteran soldiers, the other half were picked convicts from the galleys and prisons. The semi-nakedness of the latter suggested this surmise at the time; afterwards it was confirmed. As soon as these people were landed, the ships sailed away. The most probable design of this expedition—an historical enigma which no French historian has satisfactorily solved—was to attract the defensive attention of England to the south-west coast, while a more formidable descent was made elsewhere. Circumstances not revealed may have postponed the greater scheme of invasion.

III.—LANDING OF A FRENCH FORCE IN IRELAND, 1798.

During the whole of 1798 England was alarmed with reports of an intended French invasion. It was known that emissaries from Ireland were in France, on behalf of the "United Irishmen," soliciting armed assistance for an intended insurrection in that country. An insurrection occurred, but too prematurely to be aided by the French. The rebellion of 1798 was suppressed during the summer. On the 22d of August three French frigates and a brig came into Killala Bay, on the coast of the county of Mayo, and landed in a creek of the bay a military force. It has been variously stated at eleven, fourteen, and eighteen hundred men. Unless a considerable part of it subsequently escaped to sea, it could not have exceeded 1400. It was commanded by General Humbert. It had a few pieces of field artillery and a troop of mounted riflemen.

Having advanced upon the town of Killala, a small detachment of militia were defeated. The Bishop's palace was occupied as French head quarters. From thence a proclamation was issued by General Humbert, headed "Liberty! Equality! Fraternity! Union!" From which it appeared that other troops were expected, and that several unsuccessful attempts at invasion had been made. This proclamation also indicated the ultimate purpose of the French. To be London, although landing in Ireland. They advanced upon Ballina, a market town five miles inland; from thence they approached and took a position at Castlebar, after a march of fifteen hours. The space had been over not more than twelve miles in a direct line; but the absence of roads delayed their progress. At Castlebar a considerable force, under the orders of General Lake and Hutchinson, was stationed. But the Irish militia regiments were infirm in discipline, and disposed to "fraternise" with the enemy. Through them a panic arose among the other troops. On the first appearance of the French advancing from the positions above Castlebar, they broke; and all the efforts of Lake and his officers could not rally them before reaching Athlone, a distance of about thirty miles. This inglorious affair was long after known in the British army as "Castlebar races." In General Humbert's despatch to the French directory from "the army of Ireland," dated Castlebar, the action is described as having been better contested on the part of the British.

In another despatch from Castlebar, General Humbert wrote for reinforcements, namely, 2000 men, 15,000 firelocks, and 1,000,000 of cartridges. "I will venture to assert," said he, "that in one month after the arrival of this reinforcement Ireland will be free." He directed the fleet to anchor in the bay of Sarboy.

The General's next care was to "organise an administrative power for the province of Connaught." The government was to be composed of twelve members named by him. "Citizen John Moore" was appointed president. This person was shortly after tried for high treason, hanged, and beheaded, at Castlebar. Clothes and arms had been distributed to the Irish peasantry at Killala. Eight regiments of infantry, of 1200 men each, and four regiments of cavalry, of 600 each, were now to be organised.

Some of the Irish militia which should have opposed the French at Castlebar, joined them, and were speedily equipped as French riflemen. Ninety of these were afterwards hanged.

Of the French officers in Castlebar, Sir Jonah Barrington records, that, "They immediately set about putting their persons in the best order, and advertised a ball and supper that night (after the action) for the ladies of the town. This, it is said, was well attended. Decorum in all points was strictly preserved: they paid ready money for everything, and hanged some rascals who attempted to plunder. In fact, the French army established the French character wherever they occupied."—Vol. ii., p. 280.

Lord Cornwallis, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, collected about 25,000 men, and advanced westward of the Shannon in search of the French. They had been led by Irishmen of the insurrection to the county of Leitrim, with the purpose of reaching the north of Ireland. There they expected assistance from the Presbyterian Protestants, who had originated the "United Irishmen," and hoped to receive reinforcements from France at Lough Swilley, or probably at Belfast itself. To cross the almost trackless morasses and mountains was deemed undesirable after an attempt. They therefore turned their faces to the south, and would, probably, have made a bold dash upon Dublin, had they not been unexpectedly met in the county of Longford. Forty thousand Irish were to assemble at the Crooked Wood, in the county of Westmeath, to join them; but a strong body of the King's troops intervened. At the village of Ballynamuck the French surrendered; they were conveyed to England. At Lichfield, General Humbert wrote to the "citizen directors" of France, relating his surrender to an army of thirty thousand men, and stating that he was a prisoner of war upon parole. The French officers were allowed to return to France on condition of not again serving against Britain. At Dover, General Humbert wrote, October 23d, 1798, to the Protestant Bishop of Killala, in whose house he had made his first head-quarters, expressing his high esteem for his character, and regretting that his own profession and duty as a soldier had imposed on him the necessity of disturbing the repose and peaceful labours of so good a Bishop.

IV.—COMMODORE BOMPART'S EXPEDITION TO IRELAND, 1798.

On the 20th of September Commodore Bompart sailed, by order of the French Directory, to the relief of General Humbert, who had, however, surrendered three weeks before. His force consisted of one ship of the line and eight frigates, with 3000 soldiers. Another vessel sailed on the 16th with most of the leading "United Irishmen," who had been at Paris. Among these were James Napper Tandy, who, on reaching the island of Raghlin, ascertained the fate of Humbert, and landed only to scatter some proclamations. Re-embarking, they proceeded to Norway.

Bompart intended to land in some bay in the north-west of Ireland. On the 11th of October he reached the mouth of Lough Swilley. Before he could land the troops, Admiral Warren was ascertained to be bearing down upon him with six sail of the line, one razee of 60 guns, and seven frigates. The French frigates were ordered to escape through the shallow water. The ship of the line could not make the attempt. After an action of great energy on both sides, though it was exceedingly irregular in manner, the French vessels were all captured except three frigates. Wolfe Tone, one of the leaders of the "United Irishmen," was on board the ship of the line. He had been counselled, it is said, by the French officers to leave that ship and attempt his escape in one of the lighter frigates, but declined. He was not recognised as an Irishman when the officers surrendered. Next morning the officers being invited to breakfast at Admiral Warren's house, near Letter Kenny, Sir George Hill, who had been a fellow-student with Tone, recognised him. He was conveyed a prisoner to Dublin, tried and condemned to execution, but anticipated his sentence by suicide.

The alarms of invasion continued during 1799 and 1800; indeed, until the peace of Amiens. In 1801 a flotilla was formed at Boulogne, which, if not intended for the invasion of England (the French have always said it was not), had the beneficial effect of making England prepare for an invasion which, two years after, was seriously intended. In the autumn of 1801 the forces of Britain were stated to be 143 ships of the line in commission (this number is doubtful, if it mean effective ships of the line), 624 ships of other classes in commission, 42 regiments of cavalry, 147 of infantry, 130 regiments of fencibles and militia, and 72 battalions of invalids. On the 1st of October, 1801, preliminary articles of peace were signed. On the 10th General Lauriston arrived with the ratification of the treaty between France and England, and was drawn through the streets of London by the populace, so great was their joy at the return of peace.

V.—THE ENGLISH PRESS AND NAPOLEON, IN 1803: THE RUPTURE AND THREATENED INVASION.

The speeches of the Earl of Derby, Earl Grey, Lord John Russell, and other members of the British Legislature, on the first day of the session, February 3, 1852, in which they deprecated the language in some of the London papers directed towards President Louis Napoleon, recal to mind the incidents of the rupture of the peace of Amiens. Lord John Russell remarked that the Prince President has an advantage not possessed by the uncle Napoleon. The latter was ignorant of England, of the laws, of liberty of speech, and of society in this country; whereas the nephew knows England well, and knows that society is not always represented by some of these exceptional newspapers. Without expressing any opinion of approval or censure on the papers hinted at, we may point to the very material difference between the attacks on Napoleon and his family in 1803, and the animadversions on the policy of the President of France in 1852.

The attacks of which the former complained, if M. Thiers states the case truly, were not the animadversions on his policy, but gross personalities, too atrocious to be written, all of them tending to cover him with infamy. M. Thiers says, that in England those foul attacks were rightly attributed to the malice of French refugees, and obtained little credence. But Napoleon, knowing that he was living for history, feared them. He complained, and the English Ambassador promised redress; yet the attacks continued. In vain the Ambassador sought to show that they were harmless, and that in a country with a free press they could not be suppressed, except by a process of law which might fail, and which, in any case, must give them greater publicity. There were some other incidents of disagreement. Ostensibly the rupture arose about the British retention of Malta, which, in the articles of peace, they engaged to evacuate. They accused Bonaparte of aggrandisement, which those articles did not allow. But these differences might have been removed, had there not been bitterness of a personal nature which destroyed the hope of friendly negotiations. M. Thiers depicts with graphic force that scene of personal irritation, which ended in the departure of the British ambassador from Paris, and directed Napoleon to his grand scheme of invasion. There was to be a levée, and the company was arriving. "In awaiting the moment of audience, the First Consul was with Madame Bonaparte, in her apartment, playing with the child which was then his heir, the new-born infant of Louis Bonaparte and Hortense de Beauharnois." This was the eldest of the three children of whom President Louis Napoleon is youngest. Intimation was given that the British Ambassador, Lord Whitworth, had arrived. Bonaparte immediately proceeded to the public apartment, and addressed his Excellency in reproachful language loud enough for the company to hear. He complained of the reports in England, that he was secretly preparing for an invasion; complained that his honour was not trusted, and that he was grossly misrepresented and calumniated. He more than once used the words (so we learn from another source than Thiers') that every word printed against him in the English newspapers was a word of blood. Lord Whitworth retired, and sought some explanation or apology. It was refused. The rupture was speedily completed; and, says Thiers, "from that day the soul of Napoleon was filled with anger against England. To conquer that country, to humiliate, to abase, to destroy it, became the passion of his life." He began his flotilla, which should avoid the necessity of employing large ships. To transport an army of 150,000 men to England, with all the requisite stores, would have required what he did not possess

"A ship of the line," says James, "can hold on an average about 600 or 700 men, supposing the voyage occupies several days. A large frigate can hold only half that number. Two hundred ships of the line are then necessary to embark such an army—that is to say, a chimerical naval force, and which the alliance of France and England for a common object can alone realize imaginable. It would then, consequently, have been an impossible undertaking to land 150,000 men in England, if England had been at the distance from France of Egypt or the Morea. (He states the difficulties encountered in transporting the forces to Egypt under Napoleon, and to Algiers in our own day.) But there were only the Straits of Dover to be crossed. For such a passage there was no need of employing large ships; nor could they have been used had France possessed them: for there is not from Ostend to Havre a harbour capable of receiving them, and there would not have been found on the opposite coast a single port where they could have been landed."

The flotilla of small vessels was designed because of these obstacles, both of which, happily, exist in 1852 as they did in 1803, although by the appliance of steam they might not be so nearly insurmountable as then.

The first class of vessels in the flotilla were five hundred gun-sloops, contracted to convey four large guns, from 24- to 35-pounders, two in the bows and two in the stern. Five hundred sloops thus armed were estimated as equal to twenty ships of 100 guns each. They had two masts, a crew of twenty-four sailors, and were to carry a company of infantry of 100 men.

The second class of vessels, called gun-boats, were to carry two guns, one in the bow, one in the stern; a covered waggon, with ammunition, and two artillery horses, or a company of men. Of these from 300 to 400 were to be for the artillery exclusively.

A third kind of boat was called a prame, though why is not clearly ascertained from its shape. It was about sixty feet long, was to carry a company of seventy-five men, to have on board a howitzer and 4-pounder gun, and be capable of landing anywhere. These three classes of boats were to be from 1200 to 1500 in number altogether. It is said Bonaparte calculated that 100 boats, with 10,000 men, might be lost if attacked at sea on the passage. The basis of this opinion must have been a vague conjecture. The boats were to assemble at Boulogne, and were thus supposed to be capable of transporting 120,000 men. A squadron of transports at Brest was to carry from 15,000 to 18,000 troops and their stores, and that in the Texel 20,000. "Surely," exclaims the historian who is now a refugee upon our free shores, "this was enough to conquer and subdue this superb nation!"

The manner in which they would have been received by that nation which values its freedom too highly to accept an invasion of military despotism, is a problem of the past upon which we might dilate at any length; but we pass on. The years 1803 and 1804 passed, and still the flotilla was incomplete. The middle of 1805 came, and with it the incident at sea which deranged Napoleon's plans. He designed that the combined fleets of France and Spain should draw the British blockading squadron to the West Indies; then, reloading adroitly, recross the Atlantic, overwhelm the British Channel guard-ships, and act as a cover to the flotilla as it crossed to England. Lord Nelson fell into this trap, so far as the pursuit of the French was a part of it. The author of the memoirs of Marshal Ney says of Napoleon—"Master in this way of a preponderating force, riding irresistibly in the Channel, he would have embarked on board his flotilla the troops with which he would have made himself master of London and revolutionised England before that immense marine, which he could never have faced when assembled together, could have collected for its defence."

But, on re-crossing the Atlantic, to oppose the Channel fleet when Nelson was seeking them thousands of miles away, the French and Spanish admirals were attacked, 22d July, 1805, by Sir Robert Calder, and after an action which was severe though not decisive as to absolute victory, they took refuge in Ferrol and Cadiz. Admiral Calder, owing to bad weather, the encumbrance of some prizes, and disability of some of his ships, did not pursue and renew the action. But he prevented their going to the British Channel. Meanwhile the results, which time has revealed, operated on the two sides of the Channel very differently. Napoleon, chafed and vexed at the delay of his combined fleet, worked himself into a fever. The grandest scheme of his life was frustrated by their delay—that delay caused it to be abandoned. The memoirs of Ney say, "the conquest of England was postponed to another age." In England, the disapprobation of Sir Robert Calder was so strong—so vehement for not having risked a second battle with the combined fleets, that he was brought to a court-martial. The court acquitted him of cowardice, but pronounced him deserving of a severe reprimand for his grave error in judgment. He answered not a word, but quitted his ship, his head bowed down with sorrow, and retired from the service. In 1810 he was recalled to professional life for a season, and became a post-admiral, but he soon after died.

A writer in Blackwood after justly praising the sagacity of Lord Collingwood (who, in a memorial to the Admiralty, which they did not, however, profit by, suggested what Napoleon's plans were) says,—"It is a still more singular instance of the injustice and pre-judgment of public opinion, that the British Government were compelled to bring the Admiral (Calder) to a court-martial, and dismiss him from the service, because, with fifteen ships of the line, he had maintained a glorious combat with twenty-seven, captured two of their line, and defeated the greatest and best combined project ever formed by the Emperor Napoleon." Blackwood, vol. 34, p. 664.

The battle of Trafalgar, on the 21st of October following, rendered this project of invasion hopeless.

The more recent alarms of French aggression upon our shores, arising from the once probable ruptures with France upon the Syrian and "Pritchard" questions; the hypothetical plan of invasion by the Prince de Joinville; and, lastly, that now troubling the nation, call for some remarks, particularly as regards the difference of armaments which a project of invasion would now involve, and the different means of meeting it. But space does not at present allow us to proceed.

WATCH OF KING CHARLES.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

SIR, You have favoured us with an engraving of a watch given by King Charles I. to Sir Thomas Herbert, on the morning of his execution. It doubtless, a most interesting relic of that Monarch, from its being one of his last gifts; but you may not be aware of the fact, that there is in the possession of the family of Worsley, in the Isle of Wight (as an heirloom), also a watch which was given by the King to Mr. Edward Worsley on the morning of his removal from Newport to Hurst Castle (November 30th, 1648), which the King "took out of his pocket as a token of his remembrance" (see Sir Richard Worsley's "Isle of Wight," page 134), no doubt for services and adherence to his Majesty in assisting him in the attempt to escape from Carisbrooke Castle.

The outside case of this watch is of silver, and, although about the common size in diameter, is much thicker than watches of the present day. Its inside case is very richly ornamented in filigree and engraved work, with fruit and flowers. The dial is of copper, and it has one curious peculiarity, viz. a repeater; the bell of which is of singular clearness and sound; the maker's name, "Johannes Bever, Londine, fecit." The key attached to it is of brass, the handle being formed in the shape of a crown, with a rose engraved underneath. I have merely mentioned the fact, that your readers may know that the watch which you have given us a drawing of is not the only one which is in existence and can be authenticated as once the property of that unfortunate King.

WORTS.

February 2, 1852.

The following extract from "Memoirs of the two last years of the reign of that unparalleled Prince of ever blessed memory, King Charles I.," p. 132, has reference to this watch. On the morning of the fatal day, "some time ere his Majesty was private, and afterwards taking the good Bishop by the hand, looking upon him with a cheerful countenance, he said, 'Come, let us go,' and, bidding Mr. Herbert with him, he passed through a suite of rooms, and coming to the door, Hacker had given us a second warning.' Through the garden the King passed into the park, where, making a stand, he asked Mr Herbert the hour of the day, and, taking the clock in his hand, gave it him and bade him keep it in memory of him; which Mr. Herbert keeps accordingly."

THE DISCOVERY RELATIVE TO COLUMBUS.—(To the Editor.)—It may be as well to state, that, in addition to the account in the old edition of voyages alluded to by your correspondent in last Saturday's ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, the circumstance of Columbus having committed to the waves, during a storm, a sealed-up copy of his discovery, is a fact too certain to be denied. It is recorded by Herrera, Dr. Robertson, and Washington Irving. The only question now will be the genuineness of the discovered document, which, if it be genuine, will certainly be amongst the greatest curiosities this wondrous age is unfolding.

THE FRENCH SENATE;

WITH EXPLANATORY NOTES.

The French Republic, according to the new Constitution, is composed of the Senate, the Legislative Assembly, the Council of State, and the Ministers. The number of Senators is not limited, but their number is, however, limited during the first year to eighty. In addition to these, the Cardinals, Marshals, and Admirals of France office ully form part of the Senate. The recent list of senators promulgated by the President amounts to above seventy names. Adding the names of the official members to these, we find that, of the whole, four are Cardinals, six Marshals, and two Admirals; thirty-five have been members of the former Legislative Assembly, thirty have been former peers of France, eighteen have been or are generals, fourteen are ex-ministers, three are vice-Admirals, five are judicial authorities, and five are members of the Institute.

The President of the Senate is JEROME NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, youngest brother of the late Emperor Napoleon, and uncle of the President of the Republic, born at Ajaccio, the 15th November, 1784. Jerome Bonaparte, who, in early life, was a distinguished naval officer in the French service, was made an Imperial Prince on the creation of France into an Empire. Having subsequently taken an active part in the conquest of Silesia, he was, on the 15th August, 1807, named sovereign of the new kingdom of Westphalia. His monarchy fell with the fortunes of his brother, in 1814. On his return, however, of Napoleon from Elba, Jerome joined him in Paris, became a member of the Chamber of Peers, and, in the same capacity, assisted at the meeting of the Champ de Mai: he shared the Emperor's last struggles, and fought at Quatre Bras and Waterloo. After that, he retired with his consort, the Princess Catherine of Wurtemberg, to the château of Hambourg, in Austria, where they bore the titles of Prince and Princess of Montfort. Jerome, with his family, for many subsequent years, was a wanderer upon the continent of Europe. His wife died in 1833, and his eldest son, by her, in 1847. These afflictions rendering his exile insupportable, Jerome addressed a petition to the French Chamber of Deputies, begging to be allowed to go back to France. This request was refused by a small majority; but the Government of Louis Philippe stepped in, and granted its sanction to Prince Jerome's return, and he came accordingly in September, 1847. The new fortunes of the Imperial House have raised this last survivor of the brothers and sisters of Napoleon to eminent rank again. He became Governor of the Invalides the 23d December, 1848; a Marshal of France the 1st Jan., 1850, and on the 29th December he was declared President of the Senate.

The Cardinals members of the Senate are the following:—

Of noble origin, and of great natural ability, the Abbe de Bonald rose gradually in the Church. At one time he was Clerk of the Closet to the Emperor Napoleon; in 1817 he was named Vicar-General of Chartres, where he distinguished himself by his eloquent preaching. In 1823 he was consecrated Bishop of Puy; and on the 27th of April, 1840, he succeeded, as Archbishop of Lyons and Vienne, and Primate of Gaul, Cardinal Fesch, Napoleon's maternal uncle, who died at Rome the 13th May, 1839. Archbishop de Bonald became a Cardinal the 1st March, 1841.

His Eminence Cardinal JAMES MARIE ANTONY CELESTIN DU PONT, born at Villa France, near Nice, February 2, 1792; son of Benoit du Pont, a naval commissioner; educated at the seminary of Nice; eminent as a Latin poet, a theologian, and a preacher; made Bishop of Somaste in partibus in 1823, Bishop of St. Die in 1830, Archbishop of Avignon in 1836, and Archbishop of Bourges the 24th of January, 1842; named a Cardinal June 12, 1847.

His Eminence Cardinal THOMAS GOUSSER, born at Montigny-les-Charttreux, in the department of the Haute Saône, May 1, 1792; the son of a farmer, and early in life a labourer himself. His successful studies at Besancon led to his future elevation. He became Bishop of Perigueux in 1835, and Archbishop of Albens May 26, 1840. He was named a Cardinal Sept. 30, 1850. Cardinal Gousset is a theological author of very high repute

MURRAY'S READING FOR THE RAIL.
This day, with numerous Woodcuts, 2s 6d,

DR. LAYARD'S OWN NARRATIVE of his DISCOVERIES at NINEVEH. Arranged by Himself for popular circulation.
"The vast stores of materials that have been made to give popular description of Mr Layard's great discoveries have taught him and his publishers the necessity of putting an account of them in a popular form before the public. We have before us the book, and soon has the public become the wiser before the whole."—Examiner
Mr Layard was induced to undertake this publication on account of the great curiosity excited by his discoveries, and the urgent requests of the public to possess an authentic account of them."—Morning Herald

VISITS to the MONASTERIES of the LEVANT. By the Hon. ROBERT CURZON, Jun. With many additions.
"The whole of Mr Curzon's contribution to the stock of Travels in the East will be found in this volume. It is full of interest. It will have a great effect upon the minds of many readers. It is impossible to read it without feeling that the writer is a man of the highest honour and character."—Spectator
"The value of Murray's Modern Domestic Cookery consists in its plainness and practicability. The experimental and pugnacious character of the fashionable modern cookery may be left to those that a great deal too much of the material one would be wasted in culinary trifling. For Indian cookery, for the use of the Rail, for part of British digestion, Mr Murray comes forward to the rescue."—Literary Gazette
"One of the most practically useful books we have seen on the subject."—British Critic

NEW WORK BY THE AUTHOR OF "RICHARD'S JOURNAL."
Now ready, 2 vols, 21s,

THE HEIRESS in her MINORITY. A Work for Young Persons, or, the Progress of Character. By the Author of "Richard's Journal during a Visit to her Uncle in England."
In this work there is also subjoined—Ellen Ashton, or the good-for-nothing. Miss—more practical and showing a greater degree of learning than in most works of the same stamp. On the whole, the book is a small readable, compressed ere epodia, with a copious index and detailed chapter headings for youth, and a happy medium for the restless hours of a wet day in a country house, 'when ball and ball' are forbidden it, the skipping-rope is laid aside, and the grass, battledore and a battledore, are dry, and other amusements of the same genus, are impossible. Then take up these green-covered volumes, re-read an old friend, and find a good new one."—Britannia

MR GORDON CUMMING'S ADVENTURES
Now ready, Third Edition, with Illustrations, 24s,

FIVE YEARS' LION HUNTING in SOUTH AFRICA with Adventures among the Wild Beasts and Tribes of the Far Interior. By R GORDON CUMMING, Esq. of Altyre
With numerous Illustrations of the Chase
"After reading, where such but was applicable every fact recorded by Mr Cumming regarding the lion is and as one of the living animals, what I known of their manners and habits, we have found the statements we do see an important exception to such as there are but very ignorance of the organisation which was engaged to be photographic on behalf of the sportsman. Mr Cumming gives the public an answer to the accusation of the hunter's sketches."—Quarterly Review
"Mr Cumming is one that we give more credit to the truthfulness of the book which is assuredly one of extraordinary interest after the manner of Bruce."—Spectator
"Our pulse is so natural and fresh from the ocean, the scene itself in the far interior of Africa so new, and the hazards attending the chase of the formidable beasts of whom wilds so great, that it is difficult to lay the volume down until the last of such adventure as they recount follow one another, but be not sensational. In the narratives has the charm of a vivid romance—and the profound novelist may hardly withmay the native spring of his sleep kyle."—Quarterly Review.

THE FAMILY ECONOMIST, fifth year of publication.
The plan followed in the early numbers of this work are such as to commend it to universal notice. It relates to the Domestic Economy of all the various Classes to all that bears on the comforts and enjoyments of the attractions of Home. Expenditure and Income, Food and Cookery, Clothes and Clothing, Houses and Home Furniture, Children and Education, Health and Sickness, Self Culture and Advancement, Hints on Gardening, &c., form the s aple of the work. Although treating upon familiar subjects it is no servile or cumbersome duty that it inculcates, but a wise and improving regard to All the duties of Domestic Life.
"I think," says a popular writer, "that the 'Family Economist' is so well educated, and so unflaggingly keeps up the character, that one must be very hypercritical to wish to find any fault in it, or to be able to do so, and very presumptuous to offer any suggestions for its improvement. It is strictly what it pro es to be, and what it professes to do it does well.
The four volumes already published form a Treasury of Information relative to Domestic and Rural Economy.—Price 5s 6d per vo half-bound, in paper cover. London: GROOMBRIDGE and SONS, Paternoster-row. Sold by all Booksellers.

The object of the proprietors in the ARITHMEUM is to give to the public a Journal of a fi st-rate character at the lowest possible price. They believe that the poorer classes of the community are as much entitled to a perfect knowledge of the "Arithmetic" and "Literary Luxuries," to the desterious Perfume which is issued every by the wealthy, which, while it gratifies the taste, excites, at once, a mental appetite for that which is still more corrupting and destructive. The PEOPLE'S ARITHMEUM, therefore, to instruct as well as amuse, the promoters believing that they shall be able to make the system of Periodical Literature a blessing to all classes which they will be able to command, amongst a class, too, with whom it cannot be looked upon in a mental point of view, by having placed within their reach literature at so low a rate that the PEOPLE'S ARITHMEUM will supply.

THE NEW REFORM BILL.

TWENTY years ago, when Lord John Russell carried his original Reform Bill, the word "Reform" was a word of power. A palpable idea was attached to it, and it rang in the ears of the multitude like the old ballad of "Chevy Chase" upon those of Sir Philip Sydney, "stirring their hearts as with the sound of a trumpet." But those days passed, and "Reform" lost its charm. Too much was expected of it; and, when the fever heat of enthusiasm cooled down, the people discovered that they had been expending their energies in a vain pursuit. The desire of Reform, which never can be utterly extinguished in any nation claiming to be intelligent and free, took a more practical direction, and the Anti-Corn-Law agitation of the party independent of Whigs and Tories, succeeded to that which the Whigs had thriven upon for a whole generation. The common sense of the country found that, with all the defects, anomalies, absurdities, and injustices which the Reform Act had been insufficient to cure, the English people were both practically and theoretically free; and that Parliament, as the Reform Bill had constituted it, was powerful enough to remedy any real and proved abuse. It was felt that the questions of most importance in our time were economical and fiscal—not doctrinal and philosophical. The sad experience of the oppressed nations of the Continent showed, at the same time, that bran new constitutions were somewhat like the pedlar's razors—showy but useless—capable of cutting and wounding, but not of doing the particular work for which they were intended. The uneducated classes, having the boon of a cheap loaf, were contented with the Government, and did not trouble themselves, while with the cheap loaf they had good wages, about forms and principles of legislation. The classes immediately above them lost faith in the principle of a greatly extended suffrage, when they saw how pliant an instrument universal suffrage might become in the hands of despotism. All classes, with a few individual exceptions, came to the conclusion, that, defective as our parliamentary system might be, its results were, upon the whole, satisfactory. It was true that Sudbury, Harwich, St. Albans, and other such places were scandals and nuisances, but it was equally true, in law and in fact, that an Englishman's house was his castle," which was more than could be said of the house of a German or a Frenchman. It was absurd and unjust, no doubt, that Lymington, in Hampshire, a mere stagnant village, should return two members to Parliament, and that such great, wealthy, and growing cities as Manchester and Glasgow should return no more; but then it was comfortable to think that no attack could be made upon the life, limb, or property of a British subject without a remedy. It was not, theoretically, very sound that Calne should return a member, and Birkenhead none, or that a venal ten-pounder in a trumpery borough should have the privilege of a vote, while a professional man, living in lodgings or chambers in the metropolis, and paying twice the amount of the £10 rental in direct taxation, should not enjoy a similar right; but, in balancing advantages and defects, the people, though they might laugh now and then at the old patchwork Constitution of Great Britain, entertained a sincere respect for it, and were very thankful for the privilege of living under its protection. And so Parliamentary Reform went out of date as a party cry, and the most energetic reformers devoted their attention to such general reforms as Parliament could accomplish—the reform of the law, the reform of our fiscal system, and scores of less prominent, but equally important matters.

In the session of 1851, annoyed by a chance defeat, and with a view to a party triumph at a future time, the author of the Reform Act of 1832, and the author of the famous "finality" phrase, announced a new Reform Bill for the present year. It seems highly probable that the party gain to be derived from the fulfilment of the promise will be nothing, or next to nothing. It is not improbable even that damage, and not advantage, will be the result. The promise of a new Reform Bill excited no gratitude and no expectation. Nobody cared one farthing about it; and if Lord John Russell instead of introducing it on Monday last, had quietly postponed it for another twelvemonth, or to the Greek kalends, no living creature would have taken the disappointment very greatly to heart. There would have been a running fire of ill-natured commentary in and out of Parliament, but nothing more serious would have happened. The world would have wagged as merrily as before, and the Russell Administration would have died of its decrepitude, at its appointed time—neither sooner nor later—with no greater number of friends or of enemies than if its new Reform Bill had never been dreamed of.

And yet, the measure, as sketched by Lord John Russell, on Monday evening, to his very unsympathising auditory, contains many provisions for which the country might well be grateful. The enfranchisement of two such places as Birkenhead and Burnley is a tribute to the growth of trade and manufactures which is worthy of commendation. The extension of the right of voting to all persons living without the limits of boroughs, who pay direct taxes to the amount of forty shillings per annum, is surely a step in the right direction. The abolition of the property qualification, hitherto exacted from English members alone, and which was notoriously of no avail for the purposes for which it was intended, is equally entitled to respectful mention. The reconstruction of the oath, framed centuries ago, to exclude the adherents of the exiled House of Stuart, but which, in the present day, when there is no House of Stuart to trouble us, has the effect of excluding men in whom the first constituencies of the empire place their confidence, and who may be ranked among the most loyal and devoted subjects of the Crown, is also a real, a substantial, and a necessary reform. It will also be very generally admitted that there is no real necessity why a member of the Ministry, in vacating one office and accepting another, should, at the same time, vacate his seat. The new Bill, in putting an end to this inconvenience, will generally be acknowledged as useful to this extent. The other portions of the measure are of less positive value; yet it can scarcely be denied, that the men who are considered fit to serve their country in the responsible and honourable capacity of jurymen, are fit to serve it in the capacity of voters. All impartial persons will, we think, feel disposed to admit, that, in this respect, Lord John Russell has done wisely in lowering the county qualification to include this class. Whether Lord John Russell, in admitting that the original Reform Act, which requires a ten-pound qualification for voters in borough-, had placed the suffrage rather too high, did not admit rather too much, is a different question, and one on which in default of data we do not feel disposed to hazard an opinion. Whether, in praising the intelligence of the new five-pound householders, to whom he proposes to extend the suffrage, he does not somewhat exaggerate, or paint "en couleur de rose," is another point on which it seems to us that more positive information would be desirable. But on neither point is it right for us while we dwell. The Bill, as it stands at present, fresh from the mintage of its author's brain, may be a little bill, but, little as it is, a greater was not expected. Professed reformers will doubtless sneer at it; while the opposite party will find fault with it, not because it attempts little or much, but because it attempts anything, and stirs a question which, in their opinion, would have been better left alone. Yet we think that moderate men, who are not wedded to either party, and who form a reasonable estimate of the public necessities, will wish that Lord John Russell's bill may be carried without loss of time, with such amendments of detail as the majority in Parliament may see fit to engraft upon it. The fear is, that the measure may "stop the way," and impede the more important business of the Legislature. If the business is to be done, the sooner it be done the better. The circumstances of Europe and of the world are critical; and, without feeling any great enthusiasm for, or any particular hostility against, the measure itself, the country will be apt enough to grow impatient if a protracted discussion, leading to the neglect of more urgent matters, should be the result.

There is, however, a contagion of indifference as well as of enthusiasm; and we feel that in considering the new Reform Bill, we have caught the prevailing sentiment of the people. Nevertheless, we must admit, that after all there is something noble and instructive in the spectacle which England at this moment presents. While civil war is only restrained in the fairest portions of Europe by the iron grasp of a merciless military despotism, while liberty lies prostrate and bleeding, and justice is outraged every day, the great English people are freely occupied with their own business; and the first Minister of the Crown, uncoerced, even unasked, is quietly endeavouring to extend the basis of the popular liberties. This is one view of the subject which should not be lost sight of. The military tyrants of the Continent, whether friends or foes of an English alliance, will be wise if they read the lesson aright, and turn it to the proper account.

In pursuance of the provisions of the Election Petitions Act (1848) the Speaker of the House of Commons has appointed the following members to serve on the general committee of elections during the present session:—Lord Seymour (Totnes), Sir George Clerk (Dover), Mr. J. W. Patten (North Lancashire), Sir R. A. Ferguson (Londonderry), Mr. Thornely (Wolverhampton), and Sir J. Y. Buller (South Devon).

THE HOUSE OF LORDS LIBRARY.

The river front of the new Palace at Westminster may be divided in to five parts: the centre portion on the principal floor consisting of committee and conference-rooms; the parts south and north of this centre being occupied with the libraries of the Houses of Lords and Commons, and the extreme end portions of the building containing the official residences of the Speaker, Black Rod, &c.

Our Illustration this week shows one of the four spacious apartments, communicating with each other, set apart for the Library of the House of Lords. The Library is entered from a corridor leading from the centre of the building, and has communication through the Bishops' corridor with the House of Lords. Two of the four rooms are of equal size, but the others considerably less, though all are of uniform height. In arrangement of cases, panelling, bookshelves, &c., they all correspond; and from their fine proportions, the peculiarly elegant design, and beautiful character of the workmanship of the carved woodwork, the real example is rich, sumptuous, and palatial in the highest degree. Our Illustration conveys a faithful idea of the style of decoration of these superb apartments; but the painter's skill is needed to convey the rich brown tints of the carved oak, the gilded and various-coloured bindings of the books, the rubricated and beautifully painted ceiling, and the varied hues of the armorial bearings in the panels above the bookshelves, in order to make the picture complete in its ensemblance. The panels are destined to represent the armorial bearings of the Lord Chief Justices of England from the earliest period.

The carved-work of small shields and oak foliage at the windows is particularly beautiful, as are also the panels above the two doors, in the central one of which a clock is introduced. The spandrils in the doorway, of stone, are also of great delicacy of workmanship. The fireplaces are lined with Minton's encaustic tiles, and the grates are of mediæval machinery and general appearance, of admirably wrought iron and brass work. The shelves for books recede somewhat from the general front of the panelling, and by this arrangement great picturesqueness is obtained. The furniture will correspond with the fittings in the room, and is covered with morocco leather. The carpet is of very fine design—in general style similar to one which hung in the Mediæval Court in the Great Exhibition of Industry of all Nations. The Library is lighted in the evening by lamps placed on the centre tables, but which are omitted in our Engraving.

We should mention that the whole of the painted and heraldic decorations are due to the taste and skill of Messrs. Crace.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Monday.

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS.

Lord Brougham hoped the Government would extend the Law of Evidence Amendment Bill so as to provide for the personal examination of members of Parliament, with a view to the prosecution and punishment of bribery.

The Marquis of Lansdowne said the subject had been long under the consideration of the Government. In the Lower House on that very night notice of a bill on the subject would be given.

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE AMENDMENT BILL.

The Lord Chancellor moved the second reading of this bill. The measure provided that where a judgment had been obtained without the consideration of facts, precisely stating what was claimed for debt and costs. Technical and formal objections were in general to be abolished. If the defendant did not defend, judgment would be signed in eight days, and the costs would be reduced to one-fourth what they at present amount to. The bill would also abolish all cases of special demurrer. It required proceedings to be taken on the first stage, or not at all, and allowed no writ of error to be brought unless the objection had been made in the court below.

Lord Lyndhurst did not object to the second reading of the bill, as all the objections to it related to matters of detail and would be best discussed in committee. He could not, however, understand, as the machinery of the county courts had worked so well, why the same machinery should not be applied to the superior courts in all cases not exceeding £200 or £500.

Lord Brougham thought the best course would be to read the bill at once a second time. He also agreed in the suggestion of Lord Lyndhurst as to the application of the county court machinery to the superior courts.

The Lord Chancellor remarked, that, before he acceded to Lord Lyndhurst's suggestion, he should be glad to have his positive assurance that the county court machinery was adapted to the superior courts.

The bill was then read a second time.

FOREIGN REFUGEES.

In reply to a question from Lord Strangford, Earl Granville said, that Lord Palmerston had not sent any reply to the remonstrances of foreign powers with respect to the reception given here to certain political refugees. Had it, a noble Lord remained in office, he had no doubt but he would have sent the same reply as he (Earl Granville) had done.

After a short conversation on the Patent Law Amendment Bill of last session, their Lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Monday.

The Sheriffs of London, Messrs. Cotterell and Swift, appeared at the bar, and presented two petitions from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of London, in favour of the City Improvements Bill.

On the motion of Mr. Adderley, Mr. W. Cubitt, Mr. Ord, Sir R. Ferguson, Mr. Greene, Sir J. Y. Buller, Mr. Aglionby, Captain Jones, Mr. H. Drummond, Mr. Wrightson, Mr. E. Denison, and Mr. Henley were nominated the committee on standing orders.

On the motion of the same hon. member, Sir R. Ferguson, Mr. E. Denison, Mr. Sotheron, Sir J. Y. Buller, and the chairman of the committee on standing orders, were nominated the committee of selection.

RE-DIVISION OF PARISHES.

The Marquis of Blandford gave notice of a bill for a redivision of parishes, with a view to the better apportionment of ecclesiastical duty.

SIR HARRY SMITH.

Lord J. Russell, in reply to Mr. J. Williams as to the recall of Sir H. Smith, intimated that the same rule of submitting for her Majesty's approval every dispatch from the Colonial-office did not apply as in the case of the Foreign-office. The despatch recalling Sir H. Smith had been submitted to and received the sanction of the whole of the Cabinet.

THE "AMAZON."

In reply to a question from Lord Naas, Sir F. Baring said, if a motion for that purpose were made he would not object to lay on the table all the correspondence which had taken place with the Admiralty on the subject of the loss of the Amazon.

THE LIGHTING OF THE HOUSE.

Lord J. Manners begged to ask the noble Lord (Lord Seymour) whether, within the last two months, he had not received from Dr. Reid an intimation of the insecure state of the lamps which then hung over their heads? (Laughter.) It may be mentioned that during the past hour the House had exhibited no cut a alarm at the falling of some of the plaster from which the lamps suspended from the ceiling. In several directions the glass funnels gave way, and here and there large pieces fell upon the floor. The Serjeant-at-Arms narrowly escaped one of these missile frozens as they fell directly over his head, but he valiantly kept his official chair, and with uncovered head defied the storm. Many hon. members more circumspectly put their hats on.]

Lord Seymour, in reply, said "that he" had received no such intimation from Dr. Reid; and repeated the statement of the clerk of the works and the workmen employed as to the safety of the lamps.

Lord J. Manners said "that he" had not asked for an opinion on the subject, and it was quite essential that something should be done in the matter. (Hear, hear.)

The subject then dropped.

MR. FEARGUS O'CONNOR,

The Speaker acquainted the House with the fact that he had received a letter from the Police-court in Bow-street—(Laughter)—to this effect:—

"Sir,—I understand it is the practice of this commission to inform the House the arrest of any of its members: I beg leave, therefore, to report to you that Mr. Feargus O'Connor having assaulted a police-constable, I have committed him to prison for seven days, upon the provisions of the law.—I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant, Thomas Henry."

This intelligence occasioned considerable laughter.

THE GOVERNMENT MEASURE OF PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

Lord J. Russell rose amidst a very crowded House to move for leave to bring in a bill to extend the right of voting for members of Parliament and to amend the laws relating to representation. The noble Lord commenced by urging the circumstance of the tranquility of the country as rendering the present session peculiarly fitted to the consideration of the subject. He denied that it was merely on the spur of the moment, when pressed last year, that he resolved to propose a measure of parliamentary reform. In 1848, while opposing Mr. Hume's motion, he stated that the period was probably approaching when it would be well to consider whether some extension of the suffrage was not necessary. The question was discussed in the cabinet in 1849 and 1850, but on both occasions there were reasons sufficient for its postponement. But while admitting the necessity for an extension of the suffrage, he held the claim untimely which asserted the right of every individual to the franchise. He then drew an historical retrospect of all the measures of reform proposed, from that of Mr. Pitt in 1781 down to the bill of 1832, the main provisions of which, so far as they limited the franchise in counties and boroughs, he called attention to, and urged, that, if the counties and large towns only returned members, it would be impossible to say that we had a fair system of representation. Where representation depended solely on numbers, as in the United States, it had been found necessary to arm the executive in the person of the President with powers far beyond those held by the Sovereign of this country, viz. to appoint his Ministry without any reference to the opinions of Congress. It would be unwise, and destroy the balance of the constitution, if in this country the representation were confined to the town and large towns. He saw no reason, nor was it intended to propose, similarly to absolute disfranchisement in the case of the small boroughs. It was only proposed to disfranchise those boroughs which there was proof of corruption, to be ascertained by means of a commission similar to that appointed in the St. Alban's case. It would be for the House to consider whether the limits in the representation occasioned by the disfranchisement of a borough under such circumstances should not be filled up as he now proposed in the case of Sudbury and St. Alban's, by giving the vacant seats to populous and growing towns like Birkenhead and Burnley. Holding that disfranchisement was correct in itself in placing the right of voting on household suffrage at a £10 qualification, he thought the time had come when it might safely be lowered. He proposed to introduce a rated value of £6 in boroughs for the exist nce of £6 franchise. In point of numbers, he calculated that ten properties of occupiers between £5 and £10, as compared with those of £10 and upwards, was about six to ten. The proposed change, therefore, would add materially to the number of voters in boroughs. He proposed to maintain the distinction between the county and the borough franchise established by the Reform Act. The 40s. freehold franchise would not be disturbed; but, with regard to the occupation franchise, he thought the same qualification was built entitled a man to sit on juries might safely be taken as that which should give the right to vote for members of Parliament; and, accordingly, he proposed to reduce the occupation franchise in counties from £50 to £30 rental value; and with regard to copyhold tenures and long leaseholds, the qualification was to be reduced from £10 to £5. Besides these, it was proposed to give a new right of voting under ministerial to persons residing either in counties or boroughs—those residing without the limits of the borough to vote for the county, and those within, for that borough that was, the right for all persons to vote who paid direct taxes in the shape of assessed or income-tax to the amount of 40s. a year. Such new qualification, however, was not to extend to persons who paid merely for licenses. This would obviate the objection frequently and reasonably urged, that while persons holding freehold or copyhold property, and even more occupying tenants, had the right of voting, a large class of educated men, possessing property and every qualification for the exercise of the franchise, had not that right. With regard to the small boroughs, he thought on principle they should be maintained. He did not find, although there was now an outcry against them, that Mr. Pitt, Mr. Fox, or any other statesman who had propounded or supported measures of parliamentary reform, had ever suggested the total destruction of the small boroughs. It was a mistake to suppose that all these boroughs were infected with corruption more than some of the larger constituencies. In many of them the elections were conducted in as pure a manner with regard to some as it was said with truth that the influence of property control of the elections, and it was desirable that that represch should be removed, he proposed where such influence prevailed to extend the constituencies by adding neighbouring towns in the same or the adjoining county. In framing forward the Reform Act he had stated that no electoral borough under that act would have less than 300 voters; and while that was the case generally, it appeared that 14 had less than that number, about 30 more had less than 400, and several others less than 500. He proposed to abide by that standard of 500, and to add places in the neighbourhood to those which had less in order to make up that number. The number of boroughs to which this principle would apply in England and Wales would be 67. These small boroughs (except some few in Yorkshire), being in the southern and western counties, were principally in agricultural districts; and the places it was proposed to add to them would apply the same character, of course the balance of interests established by the Reform Bill would be preserved, the object being not to interfere with those interests, but to leave them as they were. Last year he had intimated that no change was to be attached as value to the property qualification of members, and that he was willing to see it abolished, and, acting on that opinion, a clause would be introduced into the bill repealing so much of the acts from Anne downwards as to that subject, so that in future the English and Irish members would in this respect be placed on a footing of equality with those of Scotland. Another subject he proposed to deal with in the bill—after the necessary provision of the House on the subject should be taken—was the oaths taken by members. He saw no advantage in maintaining invidious distinctions between the oaths of Protestants and Roman Catholics, nor in calling upon members to abjure James II. and his descendants. In the new form of oath he proposed the words "on the true faith or a Christian" should be omitted words which had never been introduced to confirm the right of sitting in Parliament to Christians, but for the purpose of different purposes. The oath he would suggest was a simple one, which all members could take alike, merely binding them to allegiance to the throne and fidelity to the succession. There would be no alteration in the oath or other clauses in regard to members accepting offices under the Crown. At present, not only when the member first accepted office, but when he changed office, his seat became vacant. He did not propose to alter the law as regarded members accepting office for the first time, but he thought that when a member who had been a Cabinet office merely changed to another under the same Administration, there should be no necessity for a re-election. As to the Irish franchise, and to the several alteration in respect to the county franchise. But, with regard to the city and borough franchise, the qualifications would be reduced from £8 to £5, it having been found that that £8 franchise great y restricted the number of voters in Ireland. The very small number on the lists of some of the boroughs had disposed Government to reject the proposition placed before the House when the Irish bill was before it. It was not advisable to add to the number of those boroughs, it was not advisable to add the neighbouring towns, and thereby secure larger and more independent constituencies. With the question of the franchise settled, Parliament would be in a position to consider one from which the name, viz. the education of the people. In another session, he trusted they would be prepared to concur in a general measure on that subject.

Mr. Hume complained of the omissions of the noble Lord's scheme, especially as to the ballot and triennial parliaments. As far as the bill went, he approved of it.

After some observations from Sir J. Walsh and Sir R. Inglis against the measure, and Mr. H. Berkeley and Mr. P. Howard in favour of it,

Mr. Bright observed, that, judging by the intelligence displayed by the ratepayers in the case of those between £5 and £10 a year in local matters, he believed there was no danger of the electoral body being deteriorated in character by the noble Lord's plan; but he regretted that care was not taken to prevent the exercise of a settlement of property by large manufacturers by large employers who had many of these smaller voters dependent upon them, by introducing the protection of the ballot. He saw no reasons for lowering the county franchise to £30 which did not apply with equal force to lowering it to £50 in favour of that to £10. What reason was there for saying that the man who occupied a £10 house in the country was not as intelligent and as respectable as the man who lived in a £5 house in a borough? If a noble Lord had talked about maintaining the balance of interests; but merely a noble Lord had talked about maintaining the balance of interests; but the preponderance of the representatives of the land and appendages of the settled question of Free Trade, which he supposed he meant, was not a balance of interests, but merely a question of numbers. He wanted to know why such places as Thetford and Harwich should send two members, while such boroughs as Manchester, Finsbury, or Westminster sent no more? A settlement on such a basis could not be permanent, nor ought it to be so. He urged the noble Lord to consider before the next stage of the bill the propriety of withdrawing the members from those small boroughs he proposed to disfranchise, and apportioning them to the large constituencies, or to new constituencies raised from more populous districts. On the subject of the ballot, he thought it would be far better to abolish them altogether, as substituting, if necessary, a system of voting papers.

Mr. H. Baillie taunted Lord John with not providing for the repeal of the Septennial Act, if he meant to make the measure a democratic one; and expressed his decided opinion that no measure of reform would give satisfaction which did not propose to shorten the duration of Parliament.

In the discussion which followed, Mr. Roche, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Trelawny, Sir J. Walmesley, Lord H. Vane, Mr. Anstey, Sir J. Tyrrell, Colonel Sibthorpe, and Mr. W. Johnston spoke.

Lord J. Russell having stated that the second reading would be taken on Friday next,

Mr. Disraeli demanded a longer interval for reflection, the more especially as it was understood the bill would not be on the table until Thursday. Judging from the Minister's statement, he did not think the project was calculated to confer that lasting peace of mind and satisfaction to any great extent; therefore he should not be prepared to go into committee on the bill and on

Lord CRANWORTH desired to know whether it would be the bill as introduced by his noble and learned friend, or as passed by the House of Commons? For the difference was rather important, seeing that the bill originally consisted of 10 clauses, of which 13 had been struck out, and of the remaining two one had the word "not" inserted, which of course totally altered its meaning—(A laugh) and 17 new clauses were introduced. (Laughter.)

Lord BROUGHAM said it was true the House of Commons had made alterations in the form of the bill, but had adopted its principle and object (which was the attaching to the courts an equal le jurisdiction; or, at all events, enabling the judges to act as Masters in Chancery); and the House had only altered the mode of carrying out the principle of the measure. (A laugh.) The chief provision inserted by the Commons, and which had been omitted by their Lordships, was the one to the effect of which he had a strong opinion, notwithstanding it had been disapproved of by their Lordships, enabling barristers to practise in the county courts without the intervention of attorneys.

NEW ZEALAND.

Earl GREY, in reply to a question from a noble Lord, said that a bill for granting a constitution to the colony of New Zealand would be introduced in the House of Commons as soon as the state of public business would permit.

RIBBONISM IN THE NORTH OF IRELAND.

The Earl of RODEN asked if it was the intention of the Government to take any extraordinary measures for the punishment of the perpetrators of the detestable outrages in the north of Ireland, and in order to prevent the recurrence of such atrocities?

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE said the Government was most anxious to take every means for the preservation of life and property. Although the steps already taken had not been so successful as was desired, yet he could not admit that they had altogether failed. He did not think that any extraordinary measures should be taken until all the legal means at the disposal of the Government should have been exhausted.

A conversation followed, in the course of which

The Earl of RODEN regretted that more stringent steps had not been taken by the Government.

The conversation then dropped.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

THE NEW REFORM BILL.—IRELAND.

Mr. KNOX wished to be informed whether Ireland would be provided for by a separate bill, or by the measure introduced by the noble Lord the right hon. Lord? In Ireland there was a general feeling that that country should be included in the English bill.

Lord J. RUSSELL replied that a separate bill would be introduced for Ireland, although there were some parts of the measure brought in the night before—those relating to oaths, for—which would be applicable to Ireland.

THE LAW OF SETTLEMENT.

In reply to Sir J. Pakington, Mr. E. BAINES said it would not be practicable, owing to the business already announced, to bring in a new Law of Settlement bill early in the present session, but he had authority to state that the Government were prepared with a bill upon this important subject, if there should appear to be any probability of legislating upon it during the present session.

TENANT RIGHT.

Mr. S. CRAWFORD moved for leave to bring in a bill to provide for the better securing and regulating the custom of tenant right as practised in the province of Ulster, and to secure compensation to improving tenants who may not make claim under the said custom, and to limit the power of eviction in certain cases.

Mr. KNOX seconded the motion.

Sir G. GREY said that as the House had on former occasions given the hon. gentleman leave to bring in measures on this subject, he should not therefore oppose the bringing in of the present bill; but it was only fair to the hon. gentleman to say, that if the bill contained the same principle as that of the bill of last session, he could not promise to aid it any assistance in its future stages. The question was one of great importance, and he would not stand in the way of its fair consideration by the House. He did not believe, however, that an Act of Parliament could remedy the evils the bill professed to touch, and he considered that all combinations to obtain, by force, a reduction of rents ought to be put down by the strong arm of the law.

After a discussion, in which Mr H. Grattan, Mr. Hume, Mr E. B. Roche, Mr. Moore, Sir J. Young, Mr. Sadleir, and Mr. B. Osborne took part, Lord J. RUSSELL said that it appeared to him that the bill was an attempt to impose wholesale upon the south of Ireland the customs of the north. Legislation upon the subject was a task of great difficulty, and he should not feel justified in assenting to leave to bring in a bill which might contain some clauses of a valuable character.

Mr. KNOX said that the noble Lord had pledged himself to legislation on this subject, which now appeared to have altogether abandoned.

Mr BRIGHT said he had paid great attention to this subject, and had thrown his views into the shape of a bill, which, however, he had not brought forward, because it had not met with the general approbation of the Irish members, or of those whom they represented. He would vote for the first and second readings of the bill, believing the subject one which could not be too much considered. The bill, as it now appeared to him, seemed to be open to many objections, and also to a Parliament of landlords, which was not very surprising, for it was too much to expect that cats could legislate properly for mice.

Mr. WHITESIDE regretted to observe, from the hon. gentleman's observation, that cats could not legislate well for mice, for the landlords of Ireland were not the tyrannical cruel class they had been so often represented to be. He agreed that a bill of a different description from that before the House would be the landlord; but it appeared as if the Government would attempt nothing, for the noble Lord at its head had abandoned a good and a sensible bill, according to his own showing, because it was objected to by some agitators who had waked upon him, and who, doubtless, would not be satisfied with anything.

After a few words from Mr. AGLIONBY,

Mr. LEWIS opposed the measure as dangerous to the rights of property. Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

RAILWAYS—IRELAND.

Mr. M'COLLAGH obtained leave to bring in a bill to enable grand juries in Ireland to make presentments in aid of railways in certain cases.

THE SALE OF BEER.

Sir J. PAKINGTON obtained leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation of the sale of beer.

COUNTY FINANCIAL BOARDS

Mr. M. GIBSON obtained leave to bring in a bill to establish county financial boards for the assessing of county rates, and for the administration of county expenditure in England and Wales.

COPYHOLDS.

Mr. AGLIONBY obtained leave to bring in a bill to effect the compulsory enfranchisement of copyhold and customary tenures.

BOARD OF CUSTOMS.

On the motion of Mr. MITCHELL, the select committee of last session, appointed to inquire into the constitution and management of the Board of Customs, was re-appointed.—Adjourned at a quarter to ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House met at noon.

Mr. F. MAULE, who was introduced by Mr. Hayter and the Lord Advocate, took the oaths and his seat on his re-election for Perth.

EDUCATION IN MANCHESTER.

Mr. BROTHERTON moved the second reading of the Manchester and Salford Education Bill, the object of which was to give facilities for the education of the humble classes of the community.

Mr. W. BROWN seconded the motion.

Mr. GIBSON moved as an amendment that the consideration of the bill be postponed until the 25th instant, as the corporation of Manchester were about to meet on the 18th of this month, to take its provisions into consideration. Should disapprove of the bill, it would be too late to oppose it if it should be now read a second time.

Mr. W. PATTEN supported the second reading of the bill, which did not interfere with any of the schools now in existence.

Mr. BRIGHT hoped the second reading would be postponed until the sentiments of the corporation of Manchester should be ascertained.

Mr. CARDWELL said the difficulty which all things, and to protect nations from it by efficacious guarantees. But, that fact and that principle even admitted, the character and general effect of the institutions which had prevailed over the national influences exist notwithstanding. Though the whole of the errors of Royalty and of the church in France should be pointed out and noted, the history of France will not be changed. The Church and Royalty still remain the tutelary influence, which has protected and directed society in France through all its glorious development. When the Revolution broke out in 1789, Royalty in our country was represented by a Prince of excellent qualities, though none of them very superior. * * * * * * *

The Church in France, at the same period, could not boast, it is true, of that distinguished piety and genius which had constituted its power and its glory during a long period of time. The effect of the ideas and principles of the age had penetrated into its ranks, much less deeply, however, than has been frequently asserted. The French Church has two replies to make to those who too severely reproach it with a laxity of morals and a mundane spirit. It supported unexampled adversity with heroic courage and devotedness; and as soon as the ground became somewhat firm it rose again from its ruins, and in a few years it has restored to Christian France a clergy worthy of its respect. A church which gave for a quarter of a century so many pious martyrs to the scaffold, and so many holy priests to the altar, was certainly not infected with an incurable disease, nor had it fallen into certain decay. I do not wish to disclose the entire truth. I have no desire to recal hideous and afflicting recollections. I wish not to excite the bursts of indignation and of pity, which, thank Heaven, are always called forth by the simple mention of the uncontrolled passion for crime and the last extremity of misfortune. I shall only allude to one single great fact of our past revolution in its calm and naked simplicity. On one side I place all the services which the Christian Church and the Monarchy rendered to France during fifteen centuries, and what King Louis XVI. and the Church of France really were at the commencement of our revolution. I place, on the other hand, what the revolution has made of the Monarchy, of the Church, of Louis XVI., and of the Christian clergy. Who can hold the scales, and not acknowledge with profound grief, that, treating as it has treated the Monarchy and the Church, Louis XVI. and the Christian clergy, the revolution trampled under foot justice and common sense, moral and political right: that it was at the same time ungrateful and iniquitous; that it violated and outraged the eternal laws of God and the vital conditions of society, and all the noble instincts of that very people in whose name it was accomplished? The lesson derived from what is passing before our eyes, our own experience, the hand of God made manifest in the destinies and the actions of men—your hon. predecessor, sir, heard and comprehended them; and, therefore, he wrote the 'History of Louis XVI.,' and he died a Christian."

LAUNCH OF THE "AMAZONAS" STEAM FRIGATE.

On Thursday week this fine frigate was launched from the building-yard of Messrs. Money Wigram and Sons, at Blackwall, for the Peruvian Government. Her principal dimensions are:

	Ft.	In.
Length between perpendiculars	197	0
Breadth extreme	43	0
Depth in hold to spar-deck	27	6
Burthen in tons 1679 42 94.
Length of gun-deck	194	6
Height between decks	7	8
Port sill from load water-line	8	0

The cabins are arranged so as to give excellent accommodation to a her officers, and are built of handsome mahogany and wainscot oak French-polished. The magazines, store-rooms, &c. are arranged similar to a frigate of her class in the Royal navy.

The Amazonas is to be fitted with a pair of engines of 300 horses collective power, with tubular boilers made by Messrs. Penn and Son, of Greenwich, on their much-approved trunk principle, which was so much admired, and obtained a prize at the Great Exhibition. The screw will be of gun-metal, with apparatus to raise it on to the deck in case of need.

The vessel is built of oak for the timbers, with East India teak for the planking, both inside and out.

She is to be supplied with a complete outfit of masts, yards, sails, anchor and chains, boats, and spare stores of suitable dimensions for a vessel of her class. She has been nine months building, and is to be finished in three months, whilst the engines are being erected on board.

ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION OF THE QUEEN OF SPAIN IN THE LONG GALLERY OF THE ROYAL PALACE, MADRID.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

ST. MARY'S CHURCH, BARNES, SURREY.

This small and picturesque Church, one of the most ancient ecclesiastical edifices in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, supposed to have been erected about the close of the twelfth century, was re-opened on Sunday week, after undergoing extensive repairs and enlargement.

The accompanying View shows the interior of the south aisle and chancel restored to their former primitive character. During the progress of the works there was discovered a triple lancet window in the east wall of the chancel, it having been filled up and plastered over. The centre opening had not been originally of the length of the two side ones, but has now been cut down to the level of the others. It was also discovered that the roof, as seen in the View, west of the chancel arch, was constructed in a semi-hexagonal form of oak timbers, moulded on the inner edges, but which was wholly obscured by plastering and whitewashing. This roof has been repaired, scraped, and varnished, and with much care restored, together with other features of the ancient part of the fabric.

The northern aisle is entirely new and capacious, and has a gallery over the same, extending also over the west end of the Church. The style here adopted is the perpendicular, as being in accordance with the date of the old west tower; the discovery of the lancet windows not having been made until the works were too much advanced to admit of following out that style. This will account for the anomalous effect of the eastern elevation, as presenting the two styles in the same frontage.

The enlargement and restoration of the Church has been effected by private subscription—from the design and under the superintendence of Mr. George Legg, architect, Queen-square, Bloomsbury. The triple window of the chancel has been filled with rich stained glass by Mr. Wailes, and other windows by Mr. Powell, from the contributions of friends.

The Lord Bishop of London preached in the morning, from the text, Exodus xx. 24: "In all places where I record my name I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee." And the sermon in the afternoon was preached by the rector, from Psalm 122, verse 1: "I was glad when they said unto me, let us go into the house of the Lord." Collections were made at both services.

A View of the exterior of this interesting Church appeared, with an historical account of the edifice, in No. 51 of the Illustrated London News.

INTERIOR OF BARNES CHURCH, RESTORED.

THE HON. JOHN MORPHETT,

FIRST SPEAKER OF THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA

The meeting of the first Legislative Assembly marks an epoch in the history of the important colony of South Australia: and the election of Mr. John Morphett to be the first Speaker is an event of no small significance in regard to the state and prospects of the settlement.

THE HON. JOHN MORPHETT, FIRST SPEAKER OF THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

John Morphett derives his descent from a Kentish family, and was born in England in 1803. Although of an energetic temperament, it became evident, as he advanced, that the warmer climates with which travelling had made him acquainted best suited his constitution, and he fortunately selected for his home that region which has proved to possess the finest climate in the world. He had, indeed, been attracted towards the settlement by the lively interest which he, as well as several of his friends and relatives, took in the system on which the colony was founded, and which has rendered it the best imitation of English society yet offered in any of our colonies—sound English society, with an active prosperity in every class, and a lovely climate over all. The first Governor and his party arrived on the shores of Gulf St. Vincent in February, 1836, and among that party was Mr. Morphett. His intelligence contributed greatly to the example which the educated settlers gave to their companions of assiduity and judgment in forming the settlement; his enterprise set the example which has encouraged South Australia to supply England with wool of the finest quality, and with wheat unsurpassed in the British market; while its products already rival the south of Europe in wines and fruits, rendering it a kind of England on the Mediterranean. Selected as a non-official member of the Governor's Council, he distinguished himself for his sagacity and his independent devotion to the interests of the colony.

On the carrying out of the Constitution recently granted under Earl Grey's act—which makes the Assembly a House of Lords and a House of Commons sitting in one chamber—Mr. Morphett was offered a seat by more than one district of the colony; but he was nominated by the Governor as a Crown member. It was to have been anticipated that the old disputes between the Government and the colonists would have made the majority in the Assembly choose a Speaker from among the elected members; but when the day came for the choice, on the 20th of August last, it fell unanimously on the Hon. John Morphett. This act of the legislative body not only proves the personal and well-merited confidence in Mr. Morphett's character, but also it shows that the breach between the colonists and the Government has been removed, and it signifies that henceforward parties are prepared to act together for the welfare of their country.

Mr. Speaker Morphett is a strong advocate for the connexion with the mother country, which many able men in the Australian colonies are doing their best to weaken. One source of discontent is the non-recognition in this country of colonial station, official or social. The loyal John Morphett himself, for instance, would here be stripped of his "Honourable" style and title, if he visited his native land. It is not only individuals that feel this disparagement; whole communities feel insulted by this slight to their representatives. How deeply might a little just courtesy and attention correct that feeling and cement the connexion by healing the natural alienation and pride which all colonists must in time feel to their parent land! Such could more strengthen that affectionate pride than the crowning of colonial worth and dignity by their full recognition in the British metropolis.

TRIUMPHAL ARCH AT HOBART TOWN.

Amidst the discontent which, unfortunately, so often characterises intelligence from our colonies, it is gratifying to find a very marked testimony to the popularity of the Governor of Vand Diemen's Land, which manifested itself at Hobart Town on the 26th of August last, in the erection of an Arch of Welcome to his Excellency—"a welcome," says the Hobart Town Advertiser, "unprecedented in the Australian colonies." The streets were filled with spectators; and foremost among the commemorations in Elizabeth-street was the Triumphal Arch we have engraved—a very effective structure, adorned with emblems of the various products of the colony. The design by Jam s Thomson consisted of a centr c arch, flanked by two smaller arches, generally fit ed with evergreens and l ves, and surmounted with pieces of machinery. The side supports of the central arch were the jaws of a whale, with bales of wool for bases, emb matic of the staple resources of the colony. On the top of the arch were sheaves of wheat, a third staple of the island, while the Royal standard of Great Britain flo t over the whole. The smaller arches were surmounted with bales of wo l and the French and American flags. On the centre arch was the motto, "Welcome," surrounded with roses, and underneath, on a Roman banner, wr n ed the arms of his Excellency, and the legend, "Presented to Sir W. T. Denison, with the gratitude of the inhabitants of Hobart Town. March 26, 1851." On the centre of the small arches was "V. R." variegated letters.

The Governor entered the town in grand procession, and on his arrival at the Arch was presented with an address of congratulation, to which his Excellency replied.

SPAIN.—THE ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION OF QUEEN ISABELLA.

The attempt on the life of the Queen of Spain, which we briefly noticed by telegraphic despatch last week, as having been made on the 2d instant, has not proved so calamitous as was at first apprehended. The 2d was the day fixed for a grand State procession of the Queen and Court from the Palace to the Church of [illegible] her Majesty returning thanks in public for her safe delivery, on the recent occasion of the birth of a Royal Princess. The assassin was an old friar, sixty-three years of age, named Martin Merino y Gomez, of sad mental infirmity, who had at his own request been secularised so far back as the year 1821, and who was well-known as an advocate of extreme Revolutionary doctrines. He was a native of Arnado, province of Logrono, in the Rioja, and was cousin to the friar of the same name who was infamously conspicuous in the late civil wars in Spain for his sanguinary ferocity.

The hour for the commencement of the Royal festival (Aestas Reales) as the pageant was denominated, had been announced in the Official Gazette to be half-past one o'clock P.M. on the 2d inst., and, as the day was very fine and the sun shining bright, almost all the population of Madrid went out of doors. The streets through which the procession was to pass were lined with troops, and the troops throughout the line were dressed out with the gayest coloured sashes, velvets, &c. The balconies were thronged with spectators, an immense crowd assembled at all the open spaces of the line of route, and the people waited with great patience till about three P.M., when the troops began to move off and take up different positions, and a rumour was soon spread that something had occurred at the palace, so that the Royal family of Algeciras would not take place. The news of the treasonable attempt soon spread through the city, and the indignation of all against the cowardly assassin was violent in the extreme.

The numerous accounts of the affair vary in some slight particulars. The Queen, who had not made her appearance abroad since the birth of the Princess, was to leave the palace shortly before two, accompanied by the Infanta Luisa, and the high functionaries of the court. Her Majesty had just heard the mass of childbirth (misa de parida) in the Chapel Royal, and was proceeding along the gallery towards the grand staircase when the assassin appeared among those who being dressed in ecclesiastical attire, and bearer, as was supposed, about to present a memorial, met with no obstacle from those around. He immediately struck at the sovereign with a dagger, which he had concealed under his cloak, but which did not take place. create satisfaction to know that the young and interesting Sovereign, though seriously wounded, is stated by her medical attendants to be rapidly recovering. The wretched maniac, not so mad as to be held unaccountable for his actions, has already suffered the extreme penalty of the law, not, however, until he had been publicly degraded from the priesthood.

It is not to be expected that every gentleman who fills a situation in the Government, whether that of a Cabinet Minister or one inferior in dignity, should be thoroughly well informed upon every public question, and especially upon questions of finance. Yet it is not too much to expect of a gentleman in such a position that he should be well informed upon every question on which he volunteers to make a statement before the public. Mr. Fox Maule has lately been addressing the electors of Perth upon a variety of topics; and among others—on which he was not called upon to speak unless he had so chosen—was the subject of the Excise Duty upon Paper. Upon that subject Mr. Maule said, "That the paper duty had been called a tax upon knowledge; but in his opinion, whether it were a tax upon knowledge or not, it was not one of large amount, and not very oppressive." To show that it was not "very" oppressive, he cited one of Mr. M'Culloch's bulky statistical books, published at a high price, and stated that "the Excise duty upon it just amounted to the mighty sum of three-halfpence." For this reason—and the right honourable gentleman either knew no other, or did not think it worth his while to bring it forward if he did he considered that the tax fell lightly, and ought not to be repealed, unless its repeal made part of some grand fiscal reform, which, for his part, he did not think likely to be produced. Without meaning the slightest disrespect to Mr. Maule, we think he ought not to have ventured to discuss this question at all, unless he had studied it, and knew something about it. In the case of books published for the rich, at a price of one guinea or two guineas per volume, we own that the tax is the merest trifle, and not worth speaking about. Were there no other books than these in England, Mr. Fox Maule might be left to his argument; but a gentleman who aspires to be a legislator, even in a much humbler capacity than that which he so worthily fills, ought to remember, that, in this age, and in this country, books have become, not the mere luxuries of the rich, but the necessities of the poor. Mr. Maule should know that there are such things in the world as newspapers, and cheap books and publications like those of Mr. Charles Dickens, the Messrs. Chambers of Edinburgh, and others, which carry on the great work of popular education, by providing mental aliment for the multitude, including the middle and lower, as well as the upper classes; and that the same tax which inflicts only three-halfpence on Mr. M'Culloch's guinea or two guinea books, weighs like a fearful burden, almost amounting to a prohibition, upon the cheap periodicals. Perth is not so far from Edinburgh or London as to have prevented Mr. Maule from asking any eminent publishers or large consumers of paper how this tax affects them. He would have learned a very different story if he had simply condescended to take that trouble, and would have found reason to qualify, if not to retract, the assertions which he made at Perth. He might yet discover, if he would only devote an hour to the subject, that the tax is in the highest degree injurious to literature, and not only to literature, but to manufactures and trade; that its operation is to prevent England from being a great paper exporting country, to prevent the poor from having cheap and good literature, and to impose a whole host of taxes not originally intended, such as a tax on paper for rooms, on papier maché furniture, on packing-cases, and on the packing-paper used both by wholesale and retail traders, often amounting to as much as five or six per cent. on the value of the articles packed. All this, and much more, he might learn, and all this he ought to have learned before he took upon himself the task of addressing a public assembly upon the subject, and calling a heavy and oppressive tax a light and unimportant one. It is not possible to name a tax that interferes in so many ways with the industry, the trade, the comfort, and the education of the people as this particular impost; and we trust that, when the subject of its abolition comes next under consideration, the country may have the benefit of Mr. Fox Maule's more enlarged and comprehensive studies. We cannot imagine that he would support the tax, if he knew it to be even half so injurious and indefensible as it is. He has avowed himself to be a firm friend of education. We believe him to be so; and as a friend of education we trust that he will devote to this important subject the attention which it merits.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

During the past week there has been a lull in the courtly hospitalities dispensed by her Majesty and the Prince consort. The Queen and his Royal Highness are in the enjoyment of excellent health

The concluding days of her Majesty's sojourn at Windsor were passed in comparative quietude, the circle of distinguished guests who left the Castle on Saturday not having been filled up by fresh arrivals.

On Tuesday (the anniversary of her Majesty's marriage) the band of the Royal Horse Guards performed a serenade on the south terrace. In the evening her Royal Highness the Duchess Prince Albert, attended by the ladies and gentlemen of the household, went to an evening party at her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent's, at Frogmore House. The Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice joined the dance for a short time during the early part of the evening. Her Majesty's private band was in attendance.

THE PRIVY COUNCIL.—The Queen held a Privy Council, at half-past two o'clock on Monday afternoon, at the Castle, at which her Majesty was pleased to appoint the Right Hon. Edward Lord Stanley of Alderley Vice-President of the Committee of Council appointed for the consideration of all matters relating to trade and foreign plantations. At the Court, Mr. Charles Barry was presented to the Queen, and had the honour of Knighthood conferred upon him by her Majesty.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent arrived in town on Monday morning from her residence, Frogmore, near Windsor. Her Royal Highness visited the Duchess of Gloucester, at Gloucester House, Piccadilly, and in the afternoon left Cavendish House, St. James's, for Frogmore.

The Duke and Duchess of Montrose entertained a select circle at dinner on Wednesday evening, at their mansion in Belgrave-square. The Duchess had a soirée dansante on Thursday.

The Countess Grey's party for the 14th instant is unavoidably postponed.

Viscountess Palmerston had a brilliant reception on Saturday evening, at the family mansion in Carlton-gardens. Almost all the rank and fashion in [illegible] and assembly took place on Wednesday evening, [illegible] mansion in the Premier, in Chesham place. The Right Hon. Lord Dinorben died at Kinmel-park, Denbighshire, on the 10th instant, in his 78th year.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The political news from Paris this week is unusually barren of interest. A few decrees respecting the formation of electoral districts, the nomination of superior officers of the new police department of the Ministry, and the costume of the new senators and councillors of state, constitute the chief acts of the Executive. The last named decree is as follows:—

Senators. Coat of blue velvet, with standing collar and cuffs embroidered, cutting close to the waist, and ornamented with embroidery on the pocket-flaps. The embroidery is to be in gold, representing palm-trees interlaced with oaks; the palm-trees in camaïeu gris de maure on the back of the palm leaves in bright embroidery, the oak leaves being worked au passé, with the lines of the leaves in bright embroidery, the whole of the coat to be edged round with embroidery, six centimetres wide at least. Council of State.—Light blue coat, with nine gilt buttons in front: waistcoat of white piqué, cut straight, with fine gilt buttons; trousers of white kerseymere, with gold band down the side. The Vice-President, the President of Sections, and the Councillors of State are to wear gold embroidery, composed of oak leaves and olive leaves interlaced, on the collar, cuffs, the front of the coat and coat tails, the whole each being edged with gold embroidery. The Vice-Presidents has gold embroidery above the pockets, and an edging of wide embroidery round the dress in every part. The Masters of Requests are to have the same description of gold embroidery on the collar, cuffs, and pockets, with narrow embroidery round the coat. The Auditors have embroidery on the collars and cuffs, but no embroidery round the coat. The hat is of black beaver, with gold ornaments placed in velvet, with white plumes for the Vice-President and the Presidents of Sections, and black plumes for the Councillors of State, the Masters of Requests, and the Auditors. The sword is to be a straight one, with gilt hilt. In undress, the Councillors of State and Masters of Requests are to wear coats embroidered on the collar and cuffs, but without the gold edging, white waistcoat, and black trousers, without gold band.

The appearance of this frivalous document at a time when important measures on finance and questions of political economy are looked for at the hands of the Government, has created a mixed feeling of ridicule and contempt in the public mind.

The President of the Republic is about to appoint four new aides-de-camp

M. Cambacères has been appointed Secretary-General of the Ministry of Police.

Rumours were in circulation during the week, that M. Fould and M. de Morny were about to resume their former offices in the Cabinet; in which case M. de Persigny would take the portfolio of Foreign Affairs, and M. Turgot receive an important embassy. Nothing definite, however, has yet transpired on the matter.

Shots having been fired, on Saturday and Sunday night, on the sentinels on duty at some of the forts around Paris, the authorities have resolved on severe measures for repressing these nocturnal attacks on soldiers.

It would appear that the French Government do not reciprocate the apprehensions of war entertained in England, for, according to a recent decision of the Minister of War, the soldiers whose service expires in 1852, and who are now on furlough, are authorised to remain absent until further order.

On Tuesday, at the Academy of Sciences, the election of a member in the place of M. Maurice, deceased, took place. The candidature presented by the commission of the Institute were M. Delessert and M. C. Bonaparte. No other candidate obtained the requisite majority; and, upon a ballot, M. Delessert, having obtained 37 votes to 24 given to M. C Bonaparte, was declared to be duly elected, subject to the approbation of the President of the Republic.

The dulness of Parisian journalism was relieved by a controversy between M. de Montalembert and M. Lemoine, of the Journal des Débats, who, commenting on M. de Montalembert's late inaugural address at the Academy, affirms that the eminent orator is not a friend to freedom.

M. de Lamartine has addressed a letter to the Journal des Débats Lore, in which he expresses his intention to refuse any invitation to offer himself as a candidate for the Legislative Body.

MM. Marc Dufraisse and Greppo, ex-representatives of the people, who had been incouded in the list of persons ordered to be transported to Cayenne, have had a change effected in their destination. They are to be banished perpetually.

M. Renaud, ex-representative of the Basses Pyrenées, who was included in the decree of banishment, has obtained permission from the Spanish Government to take up his residence at Valcarlos, near his native, M. Aguirre, ex-deputy of the Cortes.

UNITED STATES.

Advices from New York to the 28th ult. state that Kossuth was busy at Pittsburg making speeches and replying to deputations. His next visit was to be to Cleveland. The New York State Agricultural Society had passed resolutions welcoming Kossuth, and agreeing to present him with the proceedings of the association, from which he will have an opportunity of giving insight into the condition of American agriculture. One of the members likewise offered to present Kossuth with a first-rate plough, provided he would settle down in that State. Bitter hostilities had broken out between the Germans and Hungarians in the United States. Kinkel represents one race, Kossuth is the leader of the other. The feud had extended to the organs of each. The Kossuth papers have assailed Kinkel, and the Kinkel papers have assailed Kossuth, and threaten an exposure of "the truths and facts." They contend that Kinkel is as pure a patriot as every escaped, as his rival for popularity. A long letter from Kossuth to Consul Hodges, dated as far back as September 30, had found its way into the New York papers. The letter reproaches Captain Long for his conduct towards him on board the Mississippi, in refusing to take Kossuth to various ports in the Mediterranean, when on his passage from Turkey, in order to his making a "democratic demonstration" at these places.

In Congress nothing had occurred calling for special notice.

The disagreement with the Austrian Charge remains still unsettled.

The great severity of the weather all over the United States continued unabated. Navigation has been interrupted by ice at New Orleans, as well as in New York. Persons have been frozen to death at the south as Baltimore. Numbers have been forshed in the streets of New York. The quantity of ice housed by the various companies for the summer consumption and for export is immense.

Some excitement had been caused by what is regarded as an outrage on the national flag. The schooner Midas, arrived at Savannah from Rio, had reported that, on Dec. 21, lat. 8 deg. 40 min. S., long. 40 deg. 50 min. W., she was boarded by the Brazilian cruiser Sendera, and had her papers overhauled. At parting, the cruiser fired a shot across the schooner's bows.

Amongst the miscellaneous news we find noticed the termination of the Forrest (the actor) divorce case. After a trial of thirty-two days' duration, the jury had brought in a verdict on every issue in favour of the plaintiff (Mrs. Forrest), with, as a separate maintenance, an award of 3000 dollars a year.

The steamer De Witt Clinton sank on the 26th ult., a few miles below Memphis, on the Mississippi river, and thirty of the persons on board were drowned.

A famine was feared in the Lake Superior copper region.

A fire occurred in Fulton-street, New York, on the 27th ult., by which damage to the extent of £30,000 was done.

A slight shock of earthquake was felt at Louisville on the 26th ult.

A fire occurred at Springfield on the 27th ult; loss 40,000 dollars.

WEST INDIES.

The advices this week from Jamaica are to the 17th of January. The cholera had nearly disappeared in the town, and but few cases had occurred in the districts. An order had been issued by the Governor to the health officers, to place all vessels coming from places infected with cholera under quarantine.

The Legislature was still in session. Little, however, of importance had been transacted, and it was thought their labours would soon be brought to a close.

Strong hopes were entertained that a [illegible] would again be made [illegible] for the Royal Mail Company's [illegible].

A good deal of feeling still existed respecting the government of Sir Charles Grey, and it was hoped by the inhabitants that he would shortly be removed, and Lord Harris appointed his successor.

The advices from the various islands are quiet. Trade is in a very healthy state, and the weather highly favourable for the crops.

From British Guiana we learn, under date the 12th ult. that an impressive public meeting was held at George-town on the 30th of December, for the purpose of co-operating with the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society in an effort to bring the case of the West Indies under the notice of the Imperial Parliament at an early period of the present session: petitions to both Houses were drawn up and agreed to; gentlemen were also nominated to convene distinct meetings in various parts of the colony, for the purpose of seconding the measures adopted. The neighbouring colonies were expected to take the same course.

Six benefices have also been united in the diocese of Chester, of the annual value of £535. There have not any unions of benefices under the same act in the dioceses of Carlisle, Durham, Manchester, or Sodor and Man.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

In the Court of Queen's Bench, on Monday, a trial took place before Lord Campbell, and a special jury, in which a person named Mellersh was prosecuted for perjury. Mr. Holland, the real prosecutor, was a brewer, and the defendant was an attorney at Godalming. In 1843 the defendant advanced the prosecutor £2000 upon the security of a mortgage deed, and the advance was subsequently increased by another party to £12,000, and it was alleged the prosecutor was induced to sign a deed consigning property to friends of the defendant, which the prosecutor had no intention whatever to mortgage. Immediately after this transaction the defendant became the attorney and banker of the prosecutor, and, acting upon his advice, the prosecutor left Godalming because he was in a state of ill health. He remained absent from Godalming for some time, and on his return he found the defendant in possession of his mortgaged property. The prosecutor, as he alleged, then discovered that he had signed the mortgage deed without knowing the real nature of its contents, and he filed a bill in Chancery against the defendant for the purpose of upsetting the deed, and the perjury charged in this indictment was alleged to be committed in the answer to that bill. The answer set forth that so far from the prosecutor being ignorant of the real nature and effect of the deed, it was in point of fact read over to him, and minutely explained, and he was quite cognisant of the real conditions and provisions of the deed. The prosecutor, however, denied all this; and having produced evidence to be made up of a tissue of falsehoods, he was induced to prefer various indictments for perjury against the defendant, and they, indeed, as ten, but the majority of them were thrown out by the grand jury before whom they were laid. The jury, after a brief deliberation, returned a verdict for the defendant. Lord Campbell said he fully concurred in the verdict. Five indictments for perjury arising out of the proceedings in Chancery were now carried over a most scandalous extreme. He would ask the jury whether they were unanimously of opinion that no confession whatever had been cast upon the defendant? The jury, one and all, stated that they were unanimously of that opinion. This intimation was received with a burst of applause from a dense throng, who had crowded the court from the commencement of the trial. The rest of the indictments against the same defendant and others were then abandoned.

LORD BROUGHAM'S NEW COUNTY COURTS BILL.—On Saturday Lord Brougham's new bill on the County Courts was printed, by order of the House of Lords. By this bill the salaries of the judges may be increased to £1800 a year, and clerks to £700 a year. An appeal is to lie by either party to a trial any case, tried with or without a jury. The Lord Chancellor may appoint County Court Judges and commissioners and others of the Court of Bankruptcy to be officers of the Court of Chancery. The Hundred Court of Offlow is to be abolished.

ABOLITION OF THE OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF BANKRUPTS.—The Lord Chancellor has laid on the table of the House of Lords a bill (which was printed on Saturday) to abolish the office of Secretary of Bankrupts and to regulate the office of Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy. A declaration of insolvency by a trader is to be filed with the Chief Registrar. Compensation is to be given to the party holding the office to be abolished.

MR. CROMPTON AND THE LIVERPOOL COURT OF PASSAGE.—On Saturday morning the business of the Court of Passage was brought to a close by Mr Crompton, the present assessor, who has been selected to succeed Mr. Justice Patteson as one of the judges of the Queen's Bench. As Mr. Crompton was about to leave the bench, Mr. Blair, the senior barrister, rose and congratulated Mr Crompton upon the elevated position to which he was about being raised, at the same time expressing the deep regret which was felt by the bar at the removal from the assessorship of the Court of Passage of one so eminent as a lawyer, so courteous and kind as a gentleman. Mr. Crompton, who seemed much affected, said he was quite unprepared for so great a compliment, and he sincerely thanked them for their kindness. Before retiring, he wished to bear testimony to the admirable manner in which the business of the court had been conducted.

In the Southwark police-court, on Saturday last, Mr. Kennet, the landlord of the Hop and Grape Tavern, Queen-square, Westminster, was bound over in recognizances to prosecute the notorious informer, Thomas Stowell, who, with another person, stands charged with having conspired to procure the conviction of the proprietors of gambling places, by falsely accusing them under a highly penal statute. The subordinate culprit avowed his own guilt before the magistrate at the Lambeth Police Court, and made a full confession of the way in which he had committed in aid of the conspiracy.

THE HON. JUSTICE PATTESON.—On Tuesday, just before the rising of the Court, the Attorney-General, on behalf of the bar, addressing Mr. Justice Patteson, said he was deputed to express the deep regret felt by the profession at the retirement of his Lordship from a bench which he had filled with so much honour and ability, and of which he was for many years so great an ornament Mr. Just ce Patteson returned his warm thanks for the compliment just paid him, and said that, though in the enjoyment of bodily health and strength, he felt himself constrained to resign his office in consequence of the defective state of his hearing. In conclusion, he bade the members of the bar a most affectionate farewell, and wished them all health and happiness and honour in their profession. A burst of applause followed the learned Judge's reply, during the continuance of which he courteously bowed to his compeers on the bench and the bar, and then withdrew.

LIVERPOOL COUNTY COURT.—MR. RAMSHAY.—Lord Campbell gave judgment in this case on Tuesday. It was an application for a quo warranto, requiring Joseph Pollock, Esq., to show by what authority he exercised the office of Judge of the County Court at Liverpool. The grounds recited upon were, that the office to which Mr. Pollock was appointed was not legally vacant; that the evidence produced before the Chancellor of the Duchy was not given upon oath; that the Chancellor had no authority for the removal of Mr. Ramshay without affording the latter an opportunity of being heard before a jury &c. His Lordship overruled all these objections, and declared that the 9 and 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 8, being the statute in question, furnished no authority for making them.

THE FATAL INUNDATION AT HOLMFIRTH.

THE melancholy catastrophe, which we noticed in our late edition of last week, has, it appears, been much more calamitous in its consequences than was at first supposed. Scarcely recovered from the shock inflicted by the news of the burning of the Amazon, we are again put in possession of intelligence equally appalling of a calamity more exclusive in its character, and attended with a still greater destruction of human life. The circumstances of this disastrous occurrence were rendered awfully appalling, not only from its suddenness, but also from the great loss of life which it occasioned.

On Thursday morning, the 8th instant, at one o'clock, the inhabitants of Holmfirth were suddenly overwhelmed by a mountainous mass of water, which, bursting through an extensive reservoir, hurried them without a moment's warning into eternity. A more complete wreck, a more melancholy scene than Holmfirth presented to the thousands who visited it on Thursday, has never been beheld. The streets were filled with broken furniture, carding machines, huge iron boilers, bags of wool, and other things; and the grave-yards had their dead dislodged, and their contents borne again to the doors of the living.

Holmfirth is about seven miles from Huddersfield. The town is built in a deep val ey, with immense ranges of hills on each side; and at the lower end, in a somewhat circuitous course, through the centre of the town, winds the river Holme, which is crossed at different points by four stone bridges. From Holmfirth runs the valley of the Holme for a distance of several miles, winding amongst most alpine scenery, and forming deep ravines, with scarcely an outlet for three or four miles, when they terminate on vast tracts of moorland. Along the bed of these ravines runs a strong mountain stream, collecting the waters from the moors, by the streamlets which fall down the mountain sides, until it reaches Holme Bridge, where it meets and empties itself in the river Holme, which passes through Holmfirth. On each side of this strange scene are crowded cottages—not scribbling and fulling-mills along the whole course of the valley. As the supply of water in dry weather is inadequate for the purposes required, the idea was conceived of damming up water in huge reservoirs at the top of the highest hills, and to the bursting of one of these reservoirs the present frightful destruction of life and property is attributable.

The "Holme reservoirs" are three in number, and are formed at the top of the hills, at some distance from each other. They are called "the Bilberry," "the Holmestye," and the "Bawsaw" reservoirs. They were made under the authority of an act of Parliament, passed in 1840, and constructed under the superintendence of Mr. Leather, C.E., of Leeds. The cost of the whole was £70,000 or more. The particular reservoir which has caused the present destruction is "the Bilberry." It is situated three miles from Holmfirth, at the foot of the moors, which extend from the Yorkshire and Cheshire hills, and terminate in a bluff or hill called "Good Bent." The reservoir lies between two hills, called Mobrook Hill and Lion Bank, the former of which forms its north, and the latter its south boundary. The water for this reservoir is supplied from the springs of two streams at the foot of "Good Bent" bluff, which drain the vast extent of moorland in that district for many miles. The embankment to form the other side of the reservoir is somewhat in the lower direction, where there are only one or two windows; and by this means, with two natural embankments, and the one alluded to, a vast reservoir is formed, with a surface of eleven acres or more. The depth is said to be sixty feet. The supply of water is carried off by a tunnel running under the reservoir, communicated with by a funnel or chimney behind and just below the embankment, which is worked by means of a sluice. This sluice, it has been alleged, has latterly become unworkable, preventing the surplus water from being let out, and as the heavy rains have very much filled the reservoir, its weight acting upon what has long been considered an insecure embankment, the latter has suddenly given way, and allowed the accumulated waters to rush down into the ravine, along the valley of the Holme, with a force which was perfectly resistless.

The embankment of the reservoir has always been deemed being leaky, been regarded as unsafe, and from time to time rumours have been circulated in Holmfirth that it was likely to give way. Some of the company's servants, it is said, were watching it on the Wednesday before the accident, and, in consequence of what transpired, the whole of the families removed with the Dighley Mill, which is near the reservoir, fortunately removed the night before. Had they not done so, there would doubtless have been a serious addition to the present fearful loss of life. These premises consist of a large building, one hundred feet square and four stories high; a weaving shed, with thirty-four power-looms at work; steam engine and water power; two superior dwelling-houses, one occupied by Mrs. Hirst (widow of the late George Hirst) and her family, and the other by Mr. Henry Beardsall; also cottages and numerous outbuildings; making altogether quite a small town. These premises stood in a rather wide part of the valley, and not far from a bridge which crosses the river. Nearly every one swept away but another; the whole suite of buildings were swept away, with the exception of one house, built in the embankment, and of a tall engine chimney, round the base of which the angried flood seemingly spent its force.

The rumours which induced the parties at Dighley to remove were current in Holmfirth the same evening; but, unfortunately, the inhabitants disregarded them, and retired to rest, hoping that all would be well.

It appears that the pent up waters burst their barrier a little after one o'clock on Thursday morning, and in a resistless and mighty torrent swept away all obstacles. The town has a population of about 12,000, many of whom were in bed, no doubt, at one o'clock in the morning, and the only warning given was by a few watchers, who started off when it was seen that the reservoir was really about to burst its bounds, running down the streets, and crying out the dreadful news. Many bedroom windows, and startling people from their sleep as best they could. But even this brief and imperfect warning (alas! never heard by many) only extended to the entrance of Holmfirth itself, for the flood which had already overtook the warners themselves, and was its own fearful herald of destruction and death. Two scenes which occurred along the valley never could be described in all their sickening and appalling features. The rain was falling heavily, and the streets crowded with people; while along the banks hundreds were rushing madly about in their night-dresses, seeking their friends or bewailing their loss.

The Bilberry Mill, which stood a few hundred yards below the reservoir, which was in the occupation of Mr. Joseph Broadhead, was caught by the sudden swell, and about 10 feet of it, together with its gable, were washed down the valley. Dighley Upper Mill, on the same side, which is a large stone and slate structure, a party washed away, together with the whole of the farm buildings, which at the time contained twelve tons of hay, three cows, a horse, a goat, and a duck. The property of this mill was lately valued at upwards of £14,000, and it was in the hands of the executors of its late owner, Mr. George Hirst. The whole of this mill, extensive farm buildings, and seven cottages were swept down with the torrent, and with them four valuable cows, and a horse valued at forty guineas. Fortunately the inmates of the seven cottages escaped with their lives.

Bank-end Mill and its machinery is almost wholly destroyed. The wall surrounding Holme Bridge Church has been washed away by the torrent, and the few trees planted in the yard were uprooted, and had gone down the stream. The interior of the church and the graveyard presented a most awful spectacle. Inside the church the water had risen about five feet. The floor was torn up; pews had been floating, and the floor was covered with sand and mud several inches thick. In the centre of the aisle was the dead body of the goat that had been washed from Upper Dighley Mill; and within a few feet of it, resting on the seat of one of the pews, lay the remains of an infant; and on the top of the stairs leading into the gallery in the house, for as to lift into the chamber. I ran with the rest into the garret, except my father and one child, who was expected were drowned in the house. About half a minute after we got into the garret, the whole house gave way, and we were all swept down the stream, and I saw no more of any of them. No part of the house touched me that I know of. When I got into Huplh's (Bottoms') dam, I caught hold of a piece of wood and sprung up. I got a good rest of seconds, and then went under the water and lost my hold of the plank; on coming up again I got hold of another, and again rolled over; at last I got hold of a large piece of timber and kept my hold. I got hold of a small piece of wood and paddled it towards the side. A crash of wind then came and blew me towards the land on the Austonley side. I leaped off the timber and fell on to my neck in the water; but I managed to scramble out of the water and after falling several times I got into Mannal Berry's, and stripped my trousers and shirt (all I had on) and went to bed. I was nearly exhausted.

Within a stone-throw of Victor a Mill stands Dyson's Mill, which was occupied by Mr. Jonathan Sandford. In the yard of the factory Mr. Sandford resided. His house was swept away, and with it were taken himself, his two children, and his servant.

In the factory yard of Mr. Farrar two children named Woodcock were drowned, and a little further down a third was discovered dead.

At the George Inn nine bodies, principally recovered from the stream, were laid. Amongst them were Jonathan Crossland, of Hinchliffe Mill, and his son, a young man, the latter of whom had been taken out at Upper Mill, before he had been in the water many minutes. That two men had hard work to drag him out. Amongst those unfortunates was a woman named Hellwell, and her two children.

Between Mr. Farrar's premises and Holmfirth there is a row of cottages, where a person named Hellwell, his wife, and two children resided. When the water burst into the house they were all in bed, and his wife and children were drowned. Hellwell jumped to the top of his house, where he narrowly escaped death, but fortunately the water did not quite reach the ceiling, and he remained upon his precarious perch until it subsided.

At the end of Upper Bridge was a house occupied by a man named Bailey, with a wife and two children which was entirely washed down, and the inmates, and furniture thrown into the river. Bailey himself managed to get out again almost miraculously. He was thrown with great force to the opposite side of the river, caught hold of the railings and clung to them; his wife and children all perished. All the shops in this locality have been nearly destroyed. A man, manager for Mr. Crowshaw (of Pershaw), a carrier, occupied one of these houses, and he and the whole of his family perished.

In the locality of Mill Ford the flood has taken down several houses, and all its occupants and furniture have perished. S. Hartley, engineer, of Holmfirth Mill, and all his family, are supposed to have lost their lives. The house of Richard Shaw stone was also taken down by the torrent, and both he and his wife, and seven children perished. Another house on the same side of the river, at this point, is a burial-ground attached to the Wesleyan chapel. Part of the vestry was destroyed, the interior of the chapel much damaged, and the graveyard very much torn about. Coffins were floated away by the torrent, and from the vault in which the body of the late John Harpin, Esq., of Birks House, was interred about two years ago, was torn open, and the coffin, with the remains of the deceased, was washed away. What makes this rather remarkable is the fact that Mr. Harpin was one of the chief promoters of the "Holme Reservoir" scheme.

The water swept through the lower part of the mill of Messrs. Wimpenny and Woodhead, at Thong's-bridge, and carried away the dry-house and other outbuildings. The engine-man lived in a cottage on the premises. It was filled with water and he was compelled to put his head through the window to escape, but before he left it it occurred to him to look back for his child, and on turning round it was just floating out beside him: he had only just time to catch it by a leg or an arm—thus saving both himself and child. The destruction of property is enormous.

The heavy fall of rain during Saturday night and Sunday stayed for the time further search for the bodies of the sufferers. Up to Sunday morning the scale of the destruction was not fully known, but on Monday, when the water had been identified, except three, and certificates were issued that morning by the coroner to enable their friends and relatives to inter them. A great portion of the poorer sufferers were members of the Druids, Oddfellows, and other friendly societies.

Sunday (the day of burial) was a gloomy day in Holmfirth. About sixty were removed for interment at different periods of the day, mostly in the villages on the surrounding hills or up the valley. Seven bodies were taken for interment to Holme Briggs Church, but the graves had become filled with water during the night, and the churchyard, being one which the flood had swept over, was altogether in such a state of devastation and disorder, from the disturbance of graves, the destruction of the yew walls, and other damage, that it was found expedient to place the bodies in a temporary resting-place in the church tow for some weeks to come.

Notwithstanding the rain, there was an immense influx of strangers, who had come to gratify their curiosity, upwards of 20,000 persons, it is said.

On Monday last, the wea her proving somewhat favourable, a search was made for the dead, when a number of bodies were found, which were inspected by the coroner's jury, who had appointed Friday for another meeting to identify in their power the bodies which remained unclaimed. Mrs. Eccles, Spring Hardley, had a wonderful escape, stated that her mother having heard on the Wednesday previous to the accident that the reservoir was likely to burst, had removed to the house of Mr. Hawcroft, but her family objected to this, and went to bed, and sat up to await the issue, hoping to get sufficient warning to enable them to escape, should prove correct. She sat up until one o'clock on Thursday morning, and went to bed. Her mother immediately afterwards, and the apprentice boy, who had also been sleeping in the house, being suddenly floated up to a part of the roof which just remained, caught hold of the rafters and clung to them, from which he was at length removed by persons who had succeeded in reaching the roof of the house.

The Holmfirth Ladies' Committee met on Monday evening to distribute clothing. The subscriptions raised in the town now amount to £1050. At Huddersfield a good deal of sympathy has been manifested for the sufferers. The Rev. J. G endinning preached a sermon at the Independent Chapel, which led to a collection of £30. A public meeting, held on Monday at Rudder-field for the purpose of opening a subscription list for the sufferers, an application was made to have been made to the relief committee for clothing on behalf of a family of 20 by the accident, was worth the sum of £10,000. The list was about £3000 subscribed. It was said that the Commissioners of the Holme Reservoir went a couple of seasons ago to Parliament with a bill to make them liable to the expense of repairing the necessary repairs of the reservoir. The bill was defeated in the House of Peers, in consequence of an objection raised by Lord Beaumont; and it was owing to that defeat that ... present calamity had occurred.

IN OTHER PARTS OF YORKSHIRE there has also been serious damage done from the same cause—the excessive rains. On Sunday morning an aqueduct, which carries the river Keen across the front of the Littleborough tunnel of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, immediately over the line, burst, owing to the great accumulation of water from rain during the night, and inundated the line, so as to prevent several of the morning trains from passing along it. Mr. Hall, the superintendent of the line, was one of the first persons on the ground, and, on receiving information of the accident by telegraph, hurried to the spot, and found a deep cutting of the line there converted into a watercourse. Fortunately, the accident happened before the arrival of the trains from Yorkshire, the water took an opposite direction, and the damage was easily repaired. Mr. Hall caused the passengers to be taken from the Lancashire trains across the hill to the Yorkshire side, and he himself came back on the engines of trains on that side to Lancashire, so that, except for a few hours, the stoppage did not lead to any very serious inconvenience. A great number of excavators were set to work to cut away the earth and to clear the line for the passage of trains, but before night, one line of rail was entirely restored to working order. The obstruction in the railway tunnel caused by the overflow of the aqueduct has since been removed.

IN THE NEIGHBOURHOOD OF MANCHESTER there has also been an inundation. Two large reservoirs which are constructing near Woodhead, thirteen miles above Manchester, by the corporation of that town, were burst so as to fall on Sunday. But the engineer was under considerable apprehension about the Tor-side Reservoir, the embankment of which is not yet completed, would burst, and he very prudently despatched messengers down to the inhabitants below, warning them of the danger; but by keeping the water back as much as possible in the upper reservoir at Woodhead and by employing a great number of excavators to cut an extra channel for the overflow from the Tor-side, so as to keep it off the embankment, the disaster was happily averted. The quantity of water stored in the Bilberry Reservoir, which has committed such devastation at Holmfirth, is as a bucketful compared with the water in the Woodhead and Tor-side. So great was the accumulation of water, that Mr. Bateman had to discharge during many parts of the day at the rate of 2200 cubic feet of water per second, to prevent the disaster.

The Earl of Derby has consented to fill the office of patron of the Manchester Natural History Society, in the place of his late father.

Sir Edward Belcher is appointed to the command of the Arctic Expedition. It is understood that the nominations have included Captain Kellett as the second in command, and Captain Comtock and Lieut. Sherard Osborn, late of the Pioneer, to one of the steam-tenders.

An accident of a very serious nature occurred on Sunday in Hyde-park, to Mr. Barnaby, a young officer of the Grenadier Guards. Mr. Barnaby was on duty, mounted on a spirited charger, and, immediately after the guard, was riding in the direction of the Magazine, when his horse, from some unknown cause, shied, reared, and fell sideways over the rails upon his rider. Several soldiers, as well as officers of the Royal Humane Society, ran to his assistance. On being raised he was quite unconscious, blood issuing from his mouth and nostrils. A litter having been procured, he was conveyed to the barracks, and medical assistance summoned. The surgeon of the regiment was fortunately on the spot, and, by the timely administration of restoratives, Mr. Barnaby soon recovered consciousness. His principal injury is in the region of the chest, where it is believed a small bloodvessel has been ruptured. On Monday Mr. Barnaby was sufficiently recovered to be removed to his father's residence, in Eaton-place.

On Wednesday morning, about eight o'clock, a serious fire broke out upon the premises belonging to Messrs. [illegible] and Co., sail-cloth makers of Paris merchants, No. 3 Wharf, Regent's-canal. The loss is said to be very great, but the sufferers are partially insured.

COUNTRY NEWS.

FLOOD AT HEREFORD.—The river Wye has from the continued rains been flooded for a fortnight, but on Thursday week it enlarged its borders to a more than common extent, and on the following morning its impetuosity reached its climax, having for several feet deep along the streets. The people of the city has been stopped, and no intercourse could be kept up with the inhabitants except by boats or waggons. The beehives of that celebrated naturalist, Dr Bevan, were swept away, and the house was wholly surrounded by water, which was several feet deep in the rooms. No aid could be rendered to the imprisoned inhabitants, as hardly a boatman would undergo the peril of putting out. Several hundred hurdles, carcases of sheep, and other animals, with farming implements of various sorts, were seen floating about on all sides. In many of the neighbouring districts a similar scene presented itself. Not one of the five daily coaches left the city for Gloucester, owing to the flood.

MANCHESTER CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.—The annual meeting of the Chamber was held on Monday at Manchester. T. Bazley, Esq., the president took the chair. Mr. David Price moved that the report of the directors for the past year be received and entered on the minutes. The motion was seconded by Mr. Joseph Simpson. Mr. Henry Ashworth, of Bolton, said it was very satisfactory to notice the progress which had taken place in the trade of this country since the adoption of free-trade principles by the Legislature. To show what had been the result of this policy, he referred to the progress in the exports of our produce and manufactures. In the years 1840, 1841, and 1842 the average of the official values of the exports was £50,140,692 per annum. In the years 1849, 1850, and 1851, the average was £58,771,654 per annum; that is, he had not the whole of the returns for 1851, he had only reckoned the exports to be the same as those of 1850, though it was well known there had been an increase of £2,000,000. In the three years 1840, 1841, and 1842, the average value of the export of cotton manufactures was £53,000,000. During the three years 1849, 1850, and 1851 they were nearly £98,000,000 in average value, showing an increase of per cent. In the woollen manufactures the average of exports in the former period was £5 800,000, and in the latter it was £9,000,000, or an increase of 57 per cent. In the linen manufactures the exports during the first period were £3,300,000, and in the latter £4,600,000. The average value of the exports of the bulk of our other manufactures, including earthenware, hardware, machinery, &c., was in the former period £8,700,000, and in the latter £14,000,000, showing an increase of 60 per cent. The motion was carried unanimously, the directors and officers were appointed for the ensuing year, and the meeting terminated.

LIVERPOOL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.—The council of this association held a meeting on Monday, the first time since the annual general meeting, at which the following officers were elected:—Hugh Hornby, Esq., president; Francis Strand, Esq., vice-president; Samuel Smith, Esq., treasurer. An interesting letter was read from W. Brown, Esq., M.P., on the subject of decimal currency, showing the facility with which the present currency of the kingdom could be settled on this convenient principle, such change requiring the introduction of no new coin. The object was referred to a special committee. The meeting then broke up.

HOLYHEAD BREAKWATER WORKS.—A grand explosion took place a few days ago at Holyhead, in the quarries of Mr. Smith, now in course of working for material for the formation of the extensive breakwater and pier at the new harbour. Upwards of 7000 lb. of gunpowder were lodged in three chambers in a shaft 65 feet in depth, with 65 feet of heading, and this heavy charge was fired by means of wires and a galvanic battery. The explosion was, of course, instantaneous with the transmission of the electric fluid, and proved eminently successful, dislodging and throwing down upwards of 30,000 tons of stone, many masses of which were of immense weight. Several fatal accidents have ably occurred. A day or two before the above dislodgment a lamentable occurrence took place at this quarry, whereby a man named Owen Williams lost his life, having literally rushed to death by the falling of a large block of stone, weighing about four tons, upon him. He had been employed clearing away loose stones, when he slipped and fell, and before he could regain his footing, the heavy mass rolled on him, and occasioned instant death.

EASTERN COUNTIES AGRICULTURAL RELIEF ASSOCIATION.—A numerously and respectably-attended deputation, consisting of the members of this association, waited yesterday morning at Downing-street, at the residence in Downing street, for the purpose of impressing upon his Lordship the necessity of considering the following objects:—1. The repeal of the malt tax; an equitable reduction of the present enormous taxation; and the present mode of conducting the county expenditure; the abolition of the game laws; and the removal or restrictions to the growth of excisable articles; and the adaptation of the local rating-page to present prices. The deputation was introduced by Lord Rendlesham. The secretary having read an address to his Lordship, Lord J. Russell said he could not at present enter into all the important matters which had been laid before him under the notice, but he would not fail to give them the fullest consideration. He might observe, however, with regard to the malt tax, it must be understood that it supplied so large a source of revenue, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could hardly afford to repeal it. With respect to the assessed taxes, he could not but be influenced whether they could make out their case that the consumption of corn was diminished by the duty on malt, because it must be remembered that the beer duty was taken off 1830, and that the malt tax duty was proportionately raised. It should not follow that the excise duties were in some degree injurious, but he thought it would be a serious thing for the Government to propose the entire abolition of the malt tax. He could not promise another tax for the present year, which must be even brought forward were well worthy of consideration, and he (Lord John Russell) promised them that they should receive the attention of the Government. Lord Rendlesham said he was sure the Premier for the very courteous manner in which he had listened to the observations of the various speakers, the deputation withdrew.

THE RIVERS OF LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE.—Mr. Bateman, the engineer for the Manchester Corporation waterworks, calculates that the depth of rain which fell in the Crowden valley, a little above the Woodhead reservoir, since the beginning of the month, is 9½ inches, but that that does not represent more than one-sixth of the actual quantity which has fallen on the hills, which on the highest hills must have exceeded ten inches. The quantity of water impounded in the Crowden reservoir was at one time not less than 100,000,000 gallons. From the 1st to the 7th inclusive, a period of 168 hours the quantity discharged was the enormous total of 1730 cubic feet per second; and during the rains on Wednesday and Thursday, at one time the flood attained so immense a height as to allow of 2800 cubic feet per second. It is hoped that the supply of the lowest reservoir were incessantly discharging from between 500 and 600 cubic feet per second.

FATAL OCCURRENCE AT BRIGHTON.—Miss Michelson, a lady about thirty years of age, the daughter of a gentleman residing at the Grand Parade, Brighton, while seeking shelter from the rain, on Tuesday afternoon, under the portico of the Pavilion, was knocked down and dreadfully crushed by the falling of one of the ponderous gates. She was immediately conveyed in a fly to her home, where she expired in about half an hour afterwards. By the same accident, Mr. Shurcliff, of 10, Lewes-crescent, Kemptown, had his leg broken; and Miss Langridge, daughter of Captain Langridge, of Lewes-crescent, was so severely hurt at concussion of the brain resulted. She is, however, pronounced not to be in immediate danger. Several other persons who were standing under the archway at the same time escaped with slight injuries.

At a large and influential meeting of members of the University of Oxford and of several of the leading citizens, held in the hall of Exeter College, on the invitation of the rector, the bishop of Oxford in the chair, for the purpose of hearing a statement from him respecting the mission to Sarawak, and the propriety at once founding a Bishopric in Borneo, with an income of not less than £5000 per annum, the meeting was unanimous in favour of the plan. Several excellent addresses having been made upon the subject, the following resolution was agreed to:—"A fund having been raised on the occasion of Sir James Brooke's visit to England, in the year 1847, for the purpose of promoting the endowment of a Bishopric in Borneo, and it appearing from the statement made by Sir James Brooke at the meeting holden on January 29 that the time was arrived for carrying this object into effect, that a committee be formed for the above purpose, with power to co-operate with the committee already formed in Cambridge and London." A subscription was at once commenced.

EAST RETFORD ELECTION.—The Hon. W. E. Duncombe, son of Lord Feversham, was returned as member for East Retford on Wednesday, without opposition, in the room of his uncle, Captain the Hon. A. Duncombe, who is now one of the representatives of the East Rodney, of Yorkshire. At this close of the session, the number of members returned to Parliament as a Protectionist.

GREENWICH ELECTION.—On Monday the nomination of candidates for the representation of this borough, vacant by the appointment of Admiral Dundas to the command of the Mediterranean, took place. Mr. Montague Chambers, the eminent Queen's Counsel, was proposed and seconded by Mr. James Laing, of Greenwich, and Mr. T. B. Knott, of Deptford. Admiral Houston Stewart was proposed and seconded by Mr. John Pontifex, of Greenwich, and Mr. William Joly, of Woolwich. There was very little difference between the politic. sentiments of the two candidates, Mr. M Chambers, however, declared himself in favour of a very extensive franchise and the vote by ballot. Admiral Stewart was supported by the Government interest and the friends of Admiral Dundas. The poll commenced on Tuesday, and at four o'clock, when it finally closed, the numbers were—

For Admiral Stewart	[illegible]
For [illegible]	[illegible]

On Wednesday the returning officer declared Admiral Houston Stewart to be duly elected.

WRECK OF THE "AMAZON."—On Monday last, after much boisterous weather, a long piece of new timber (red pine), very much burnt, with a bolt sticking in each end, and about 18 feet long, was found by the steward; and there exists no doubt whatever but that it is part of the unfortunate steam-ship Amazon. It is in the possession of Mr. Henry Simmons, bailiff and mayor of the town and port, and supposed to be a portion of one of the paddle-boxes. The step of a mast, and some other charred fragments, have also been picked up in the neighbourhood. The wreck must have drifted about 130 in lea

BASINGSTOKE AND SALISBURY RAILWAY.—On Saturday the standing orders were declared not complied with in the case of the company's bill for making a railway from Basingstoke, i in the county of Southampton, to Salisbury, in the county of Wilts, at a cost of £350 000. The non-compliances were only with reference to the plans as to whether the subscription contract signed for £2,2,200, and 1 with 21 £20 paid up, was a copy of the original.

Sergeant Kinglake has addressed the electors of Bridgwater, soliciting their votes at the next election.

At a meeting held in Sheffield in the early part of the week, at which the Mayor presided, it was resolved that Joshua Toulmin Smith, Esq., be invited to address the electors in explanation of his political principles, with a view to nominating him as a candidate at the ensuing election, if his principles should meet general approval.

At the present time there are not 1000 quarters of foreign barley, malting or grinding qualities, in the three important ports of Hull, Newcastle, and Leith. Last year, at the same time, there were above 100,000 quarters.

A fire broke out on the 25th ult. in the printing-house of the University of Upsala, in Sweden, and before assistance could be procured the warehouse and great part of the printing-office was burnt down. The fire was the act of an incendiary. The damage done is considerable, if not irreparable. Many ancient and very precious manuscripts have been burnt among them the valuable chronicle, "Ibn et Athar," in Arabic, of which Professor Tornberg was just preparing an edition, with a Latin translation, notes, and commentaries.

In one head of each cask is much burnt, showing them to have been exposed to a strong fire.

There is every reason to believe that the barque which was hovering about the burning Amazon, and which is supposed to have picked up some of the missing Amazon people, cleared out from Cowes in ballast, and was bound for the West Indies. The chief officer of the Trent, which brought home the Mexican mail on Sunday, is Mr. Strutt, the brother of the unfortunate purser of the Amazon, who was lost.

The Right Hon. Fox Maule was on Monday returned a representative for the borough of Perth, having been elected to a new election upon his appointment to the Presidency of the India Board. Mr. Gilpin, as a warm supporter of the ballot, was nominated as an opponent to the right hon gentleman, but he declined to go to the poll.

The Austrian Lloyd states that Maurice Pataki, the Hungarian who was arrested at Rendsburgh on a charge of attempting to seduce some Hungarian regiments from their allegiance to the Emperor, and of being an agent of Kossuth and Mazzini, and who on these charges had been sentenced to death by an Austrian court martial on the 30th ult., was executed on the 5th inst.

The steamer Madrid, which left Southampton on the 7th inst., with the Peninsular mail, was obliged to put into Falmouth on account of the strong gales from the west-south west and west, and heavy head seas. An ingenious discovery has been made by Mr. Gray, of Cork-street, by which it appears that the combination of india-rubber with gutta percha may be rendered applicable to the formation of artificial features. So complete is the deception, that without the closest inspection it is almost impossible to discover that a tooth is not a sound natural tooth.

The action, "Smith v. London and North Western Railway Company," which was for 1 earing on the 7th inst. on the demurrer of the 4th company named by the company paying the plaintiff £700. He had laid the damages at £2000. The escape of Mr. Smith, an accountant, residing at 14, Priory street, Camden-Town, in the railway catastrophe at Bicester, was miraculous. The six box-seats behind were all in the same carriage as he was when the disaster occurred.

The anniversary of her Majesty's wedding-day was celebrated on Tuesday, at Windsor, with the customary demonstrations of loyalty and respect. Merry peals were rung at intervals throughout the day from the bells of St. George's and St. John's Churches; and Royal salutes were fired from the corporation battery in the Bachelors'-acre, and also from Fort Belvedere. In the evening a ball took place at the town-hall, under the patronage of the mayor and other inhabitants of the borough.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

AUGMENTATION OF THE ARMY.—The following seven depôts (the service companies are at the Cape) are to be increased 150 each, viz. depôts 24, 6th, 43d, 2nd battalion 60th, 73d, 74th, and 1st battalion Rifle Brigade. The depôts of the 15th regiment (service companies at Ceylon) and of the 99th (service companies at Hong Kong) are as already intimated, to be reduced 100 each, and in future will be 200 instead of 400. This will bring the above nine regiments are to be divided as follows:—Service companies, 600; depôt companies, 300; total, 900. In all other respects the augmentation will, we believe, be effected as we have already explained.

MILITIA STAFF.—A circular letter, dated Whitehall, 31st ult., has been received by the Lords Lieutenants of counties, stating that her Majesty has been pleased to command that an inspection of the permanent staff of the militia in the United Kingdom should take place at the earliest possible period, and that an officer of her Majesty's regular forces, assisted by a regimental or staff surgeon, will visit the head-quarters of each regiment of militia for this purpose.

NEW RIFLE MUSKETS.—500 of the new rifle muskets have lately been sent in the Hydra steamer to the Cape of Good Hope, with a large quantity of the Minié ammunition.

ADMIRALTY TRIALS OF SHIPS' ANCHORS.—The committee of naval officers and shipowners selected to test the relative properties and merits of ships' anchors, having at a preliminary meeting held at Sheerness come to the following resolutions, the same are made known for the information of all parties who may be desirous of having anchors tested:—1. That the trials be open to anchors of all nations. 2. That they be made at the anchorages for these trials in the Swin, including the stock. 3. That every anchor previous to being allowed to enter into competition must be tested at Woolwich. 4. That the anchors be landed at Woolwich after testing by the 1st of May next, at Sheerness by the 1st of June, and the trials to commence on the 1st of July next. 5. That the committee will not hold themselves responsible for any loss or damage that may be sustained by the anchors, nor be liable for any expense in bringing them to, or taking them from, Sheerness. The trials will take place at Sheerness. Admiralty, Feb. 2, 1852.—J. PARKER.

Several volunteer rifle associations have been formed in different localities throughout the country.

MARINES.—Ships of war commissioned in future will have the following reductions made in the complements of Royal Marines: First-rates will have 1 sergeant, 1 corporal, and 38 privates less than the complements of such ships at present in commission; second-rates, 1 sergeant, 1 corporal, and 33 privates less; third-rates, 1 sergeant, 1 corporal, and 28 privates less; fourth-rates, 1 sergeant, 1 corporal, and 23 privates less; fifth-rates, 10 privates less; and sixth-rates, 6 privates less.

NOVEL AND DESTRUCTIVE RIFLE.—Experiments were made during the week in the metropolis with a new rifle, invented by an American of the name of Jennings, which fires 25 distinct shots with one loading. The rifle has the appearance of an ordinary double-barrelled gun, with the exception that the barrels are placed one above the other, and the lower barrel is rather shorter than the upper. In the lower barrel are placed 25 bullets of a conical shape, each about an inch in length. The upper part of these bullets is charged with powder, and by a slight movement of a small lever they are brought into the upper barrel one after the other, as the previous one is discharged from it. In the stock there is a small box for holding a number of detonating pills, quite on the homeopathic principle, which one by one is fed under the hammer of the trigger, and do the duty of the ordinary copper caps. The operator discharged his gun 25 times in about a minute, and he stated that he can load and reload his gun and fire it 125 times in less than five minutes. The gun has been submitted to and is under the consideration of, the Board of Ordnance.

Sir James Stirling has been appointed to the vacancy at the Admiralty Board, caused by the retirement of Rear-Admiral Dundas.

The Agnes, merchant brig, Foy master, sailed from the Motherbank on Tuesday afternoon for Trinidad, and in beating down the Solent-water she got on snore last night off Cowes. Admiral Sir Thomas Briggs, on learning the fact, immediately ordered the Sprightly steam-vessel to her assistance.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.—WORKS OF LIVING ARTISTS.

THE Exhibition of Works of Living Artists was opened to the public on Monday. Viewing the collection as a whole, it is highly creditable to the arts of the country. A very large proportion of the works exhibited are landscapes, a school peculiarly English, and one in which, guided by educated fancy and a proper amount of the inventive faculty, native talent might, perhaps, do more than in any other to improve the public taste and inculcate a love of the pictorial art. We are not without apprehension, however, that the very facilities which our rural scenery presents—being pictures in themselves, pictures endowed with a poetry all their own—scenes of comfortable homesteads and verdant lanes, endeared to all by domestic associations we fear, we say, that, led away by the facility of such scenes and the facility of copying them, our landscape painters do not sufficiently strive to enrich them with all the glorious attributes and effects of which they are capable, and with which, in fact, they are all invested in their season. Shady lanes are good and refreshing, green fields are good and beautiful; rapid purling streams silently meandering through plain or mead, or dashing noisily over stony ways, or struggling through tangled copse—all these are good and true, and speak of the British isle in its most beautiful development. But shady lanes are nought, if there be no hot sunshine to shade away; green fields are nought, if there be no golden sun to illumine and invigorate the atmosphere; streams sparkle coldly if no sun ray dance upon their surface, and elevate the soul from contemplation of the sequestered dell through which they steal, to the bright broad firmament and to the life of the wider world without. The judicious mixture of combining, within the scope of a single landscape, the coolness of shady groves with the warmth of the life-giving sun of blending in one picture the whole world of life which results from a due adjustment of these two antagonistic principles, is undoubtedly great; but it is a difficulty which must be surmounted by those who would illustrate the art of landscape-painting in its highest walks. Titian did it often; Rubens, also, most magnificently—witness his glorious landscape in our National Gallery; also our own Gainsborough, the prince of British landscape-painters.

What we have to complain of in our landscape-painters of the present day is, that they will not qualify the more ostensible or predominating tendencies of the subject selected by those means which are legitimately at their command; and that consequently they present, not a broad, general, wholesome picture of nature, but an exceptional or one-sided view. Descending to a lower branch of art—that of portrait-painting—is not the peculiar talent of the artist shown, in his seizing upon the most prominent expression of his sitter, and inventing at the times circumstances of light and shade and attribute which may best suit and illustrate its character? And if this be the case in portraiture, why not in landscape-painting? why not, except that the natural opportunities in the latter are greater than in the former, and capable of a far wider diversity of treatment—advantages which none but a highly inspired hand and poetic judgment can turn to the very best account.

To close these general observations for the present, we remark that, as it is easier to paint green trees and dark waters under the influence of a grey sky, than to gild their varied beauties with the rays of the great orb of day, and revel in all the varied hues and effects which would result from such a combination. The landscapes ordinarily presented to us on these occasions are chiefly cool in tone, but to say sometimes absolutely chilly; whilst in the case of a few exceptions where the sun is permitted to appear, he is made to rule as sole lord of the ascendant, without any attempt to qualify the tone of the picture by the introduction of foliage or shade, which are just as essential elements as sunlight in landscape scenery. Thus, in neither case, is nature robbed of half her attributes, and art of much more than half its legitimate effect.

Creswick has two pictures, or rather a picture and a half. The "Road by the River-side" (No. 9) is entirely his own, and fully worthy of his well-earned fame. Here we have a romantic spot where the enormous stem of a tree is seen through moss-grown rocks, dark and transparent in the middle recesses, and anon dashing boldly over, its waters mingling at last with the very base of the picture. The "Dell" Halt" is a landscape of a more domestic character, in which the dell with his sheep and his white pony, are admirably introduced. Ansdell. This clever animal painter has another piece, "Deer Coming" (No 14), a wild and lonely spot, on a sheep-down, where a group of sheep and rams are looking out across the moor towards the point where the shepherd is seen approaching with some stray members of the flock. The woolly coats of the animals are achieved with wonderful truthfulness, and their general character well preserved.

F. R. Lee has two pictures, one of which, the "River Teign, Devon" (No. 25), presents a rich luxuriance of foliage, the somewhat opaque effect of which might have been happily relieved by the introduction of a few rays of sunlight.

Sir E. Landseer contributes a picture of wide dimensions—7 ft. 10 in. by 4 ft. 1 in. "A Deer Pass," with a group of deer perched on a perilous pinnacle overhanging a yawning abyss.

> I am monarch of all I survey,
> My right there is none dare dispute.

The animals in their treatment exhibit all the characteristic intelligence and truthfulness of surface which we expect from this accomplished hand, but the landscape is unequally painted; the massive granite rocks on the left are accurately studied, but the green patches introduced on the right are thinly and carelessly laid on, and fail of their intended effect for want of aerial perspective.

OPENING OF THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

A MOUNTAIN SPRING PAINTED BY H. JUTSUM.

H. Jutsum has three Landscapes in different styles. No. 69, "Ivy Bridge, Devonshire," is a bit of genuine English scenery, a snug little village nestling in a vale, sheltered by trees, the light smoke from some of the chimneys stealing gently upwards amidst the dews of evening. In the foreground is a group of cattle arrived just in time at the homestead, as the last ray of the evening sun is setting upon it. All is true to nature in conception, and deliciously executed. No. 331, "A Mountain Spring" (which we Engrave), represents a heath, with its variously-coloured herbage, and a sparkling streamlet bounding from the distance towards the front on one side. The effect of eventide is well developed in the treatment of the sky; and some figures of wayfarers, judiciously introduced, form, by their warmth of local colour, an agreeable point of repose for the eye. No. 404, entitled "In the Happy Month of June," introduces us to a sequestered dell, in which a deep water-course bespeaks refreshing coolness even beneath a midsummer sky. A tone of warmth is introduced into the colouring in the middle parts of the picture, which betrays the effect of the sultry heat of summer; although we cannot say that the sky tints are quite in harmony with this idea.

Middleton's picture of "Waybourne, on the Norfolk Coast" (No. 226), with an ominous distich attached

> He who would old England win,
> Must at Waybourne Hope begin—is painted in a full, truthful style, without any attempt at affectation or trick. The subject is a good one—a fine open country, with bold sea-reach in the distance—and has been done justice to.

We wish we could speak favourably of Linton's "Scene near Naples" (No 277), but it is impossible; nor must we pass it unnoticed. Here we have an awkward group of idlers, not particularly well drawn, under a leafy shade, beneath a miserably cold and leaden sky, itself a perfect libel upon the atmospheric reputation of fair Naples. The colours are jumbled together without taste or attempt at harmony; and are in themselves signally devoid of brightness and transparency.

Holland has three pictures, in which his remarkable talent for colouring is manifested more or less successfully. "Genoa, from the East Rampart, Sept., 1851" (No 1), represents the famed bay of that name under the influence of a coming storm: the sea deep, blue, cold; the surface crisping under the breeze, whilst on the right the rampart stands out boldly in the always clear, but now preternaturally clear, atmosphere. We are not altogether satisfied with the "manner" (that is the word) in which some of the architectural details are laid in; and the ugly wreathes sprawling about on the top of the wall at the extreme right so detract from the general effect, that we could wish the artist had let them fall into the sea before he took his sketch. No. 215, "The Lagunes of Venice," is a small sea-piece, differently treated; the rich colouring of the gondolas in the foreground, and the cheerful outline of the island city in the far distance, adding a happy life-like effect, which is wanting in the last-named production. In No 109, the "Piazza Signori, Verona," the artist chooses a remarkable architectural situation a double arch standing across the street, which divides the picture, breaking the blue sky into patches, the lower part blending with various-coloured roofs, buildings, &c., in the mid distance. In the foreground some figures are introduced, but the artist is not fortunate in such subjects, and they only spoil the general effect of his work, which, though far from faultless, is yet highly creditable. What this artist appears to want in his colouring is a little more attention to harmony and a little less striving after strong effects.

Herring has presented us with two beautiful pieces of scenery. No 204, "The Castle of Betzko and the Valley of the Waag, in Hungary," and No 244, "The Island of Capri," the latter of which is most to our taste, being indeed exquisitely treated. The mountain side, glowing in the rays of the setting sun, rises boldly out of the sea, the portion of which intervening between it and the eye of the spectator is partially in the shade. More exquisite still, however, than either of the above, is the same artist's imaginative subject, "Le Salut d'Or" (No. 467). The scene is a wild, marshy district, probably in Greece, with the ruins of a classic temple palpable in the gloom, which is about to envelop the setting sun. Standing alone, most melancholy in solitude, and on the very border of a small lake, is a venerable heron, whose outline is so faintly put in, that upon a first glance at the picture his presence is hardly perceived. The colouring of this charming morceau is rich and transparent, and admirable for tone and keeping.

THE SHEPHERD'S DAUGHTER.—PAINTED BY T. F. MARSHALL.

Marshall's little picture of the "Shepherd's Daughter" (which we engrave) is a chaste and pleasing study. The colouring being warm and genial, the figure stands out with remarkable effect against a clear blue sky. The sheep and other accessories are tastefully introduced.

We have yet several works of merit and interest to mention, but must reserve them for a second notice.

THE TUNBRIDGE WELLS AND HASTINGS RAILWAY.

BATTLE STATION.

This new line of railway was opened for traffic on the 1st inst. On emerging from the tunnel at Bopeep, the line curves, crossing the race-course in a direction for Grove Farm. At this spot a farewell glimpse is caught of the sea on the left, with Filsham House, the residence of Mr. E. Farncombe, standing on an elevation in the foreground. Traversing some heavy cuttings, the train soon reaches Wilton, near the farm-house of that name, and passes over the great bog before alluded to. Leaving these in the rear, an enchanting view of Crowhurst Vale, with the church, High-house, together with a distant sight of Bexhill and the neighbour hood, is obtained. This mingled scene of hill and dale, wood and village, presents one of those fair spots in nature which refresh the traveller, who, hurrying through tunnel and cutting to annihilate time and space, for a moment disregards the beauties of the country through which he is passing. On the right of the line is Crowhurst-place, the domain of G. Gatty, Esq. Further on is a deep cutting through Tellum-hill: at the top of the south embankment stands the old farm-house. We understand that a suspension-bridge will be constructed here; and from the summit of Telham-hill the best view of Battle Abbey and its vicinity is obtained. The train, after passing under the Hastings and Battle coach-road, arrived at the Battle station at five minutes past seven o'clock; it then left for Tunbridge, calling at the various stations along the line.

The stations on this line are at Fraut, Wadhurst, Ticehurst-road Etchingham, Robertsbridge, and Battle. Those at Fraut, Etchingham and Battle are of Gothic character, built of native stone, with Caen stone dressings, the roofs being covered with alternate bands of plain and ornamental tiles. The booking-office roofs are open-framed of stained fir, and have a good effect. The stations at Wadhurst, Tunbridge-road, and Robertsbridge, are Italian in design, of red and white brick and Caen stone. There are also several lodges for gate-keepers at level crossings, of similar character to the stations. The architect is Mr. William Trees, of Finsbury-square, who also designed the St. Leonard and Hastings stations; the latter is seen in the distance in our View of Hastings, and is remarkable for the disposition of its plan, arising from a peculiarity of situation, in an angle formed by the junction of two lines of railway; it is of pleasing Italian character. The contractors for the Battle Station were Messrs. Smith, of Rye.

"The completion of the line (says the Sussex Advertiser) is an important event for Hastings, since it opens a communication with an entirely new district, Robertsbridge, Hawkhurst, Tunbridge Wells, and a great portion of Kent: a district which, though not so extensive, is quite as 'foreign' as that introduced to Hastings by the opening of the Ashford branch. We think that the corn-market and trade of the town will also be benefited by the facility of transit thus established. The abbey and neighbourhood of Battle will doubtless induce a great influx of persons from Hastings and St. Leonard's, while the market established at Robertsbridge will reap benefit by being brought within reach of these parts. Hastings and St. Leonard's have now twenty-two trains daily arriving and departing from their stations; viz. South-coast eight, Tunbridge Wells branch eight, and Ashford branch six. No less than ninety-six towns are now brought into direct railway communication with Hastings and St. Leonard's."

ST. VALENTINE'S-DAY.

In honour of the very popular and propitious Saint who presides over this day (Feb. 14,) we present each of our readers with the proper flowers of the season—the true love-knot—

A BUNCH OF VALENTINES.

The time draws nigh, on fragrant wing,
Of Summer beams and bells,
But Love comes faster than the Spring,
And works with sweeter spells.

To him, upon the unsunn'd breeze,
Immortal odours float;
And they may sail o'er ice-bound seas,
Who take his golden boat.

The primrose faints within thy hair,
The snowdrop looketh pale;
There is not sunshine in the air,
Nor singing on the gale.

Look in with those beloved eyes
Upon this heart of mine,
Bloom, scent, and song will all arise,
To hail my Valentine!

Soon to the Rose the Nightingale
Shall breathe his tender lay;
But Love, that hath a sweeter tale,
Must tell that tale to-day
In sighs, which are the spirit's song,
My soul is pour'd to thine;
And time grows young, and hope grows strong,
To hail my Valentine.

Since darken'd hearts Love maketh bright,
What might he do for ours?
Make all their fancies speak in light,
Their feelings grow in flowers.
Glad fancies, flinging song about,
Like stars, the while they shine,
And feelings giving fragrance out
Because they interwine.

Wherever Love hath touch'd the ground,
It is the time of roses;
Of fairy wreaths with whose round
The sighing soul reposes.
Oh! take my spirit home to thine,
Elsewhere 'tis wintry weather.
Hearts only yield their bloom divine
When two have bloom'd together.

Now, blessed be Saint Valentine,
By whose high leave I pour
Words in this gentle ear of thine
I never dared before!
Each thing to-day, in glade or nook,
May name its Valentine,
I read out boldly from Love's book,
And, dearest, thou art mine!

The breeze hath found the wallflower out,
And feedeth on it's sigh,
The hunter bee now hunts about
The violet's deep-blue eye:
Escaping from its icy chain,
The river runneth free,
And so, my heart flings off its pain,
And cometh straight to thee!

A blessing on Saint Valentine!
He is a good old saint,
And taketh strong to speak to thine
My soul that was so faint.
And then he serves a spirit, sweet!
More loving than his own:
His task, to lead Love's pilgrim feet
To Hymen's altar-throne.
So, blessings on Saint Valentine,
I am his worshipper, and thine!

LOVE ON THE THRESHOLD.

Love, lady, on his own bright morn,
Hath brought me to thy door,
Thou wilt not let thy look be scorn,
And Cupid on the floor.
To-day, for old Saint Valentine,
His ringers all his bells,
And I am trusting, lady mine,
To him and to his spells.

He sits to-day by every hearth,
And sings to every heart—
In all the chorus of his mirth,
Hath only mine no part?
Oh! coldness never look'd before
From loving eyes like thine:
So, bid me, dearest, pass the door,
And claim my Valentine!

LOVE BY THE CHURCH.

The leaf is not upon the tree,
The song-bird in the grove,
Yet hear I, as I gaze on thee,
The singing of the dove.
Spring scents I cannot miss or prize,
While feeding on thy breath,
Nor do I seek for bright blue skies
While I thus art underneath.

What care I that the stream be dim,
While I thus art by the stream?
There cometh to my heart a hymn,
And to mine eyes a gleam,
From yon old church, whose merry bells
Fling up to heaven their mirth,
Yet seem to whisper, "Heaven's spells
May here be cast for earth."
May such be to thy soul and mine
The message of Saint Valentine!

LOVE'S HOME.

Look, love! upon the picture fair my heart hath traced for thee,
When sit to thine shall be that heart, as thou art all to me;
And if the picture to thine eyes seem sweet as unto mine,
Oh! turn thy beauty on my soul, and be my Valentine!

We two will have a summer out o'ermantled by the vine,
And by the flower-crown'd porch a bench whereon the sun may shine;
And tamed by thy fair hand will feed, all wood-wooed birds shall come—
The blackbird singing from our grove, the red-breast by our home.

And sylvan scenes shall stretch away before our windows wide;
The far-away seem beautiful whilst thou art by my side:
There hand in hand we'll wander forth where soft the daylight dies,
And I will ask no other light than that within thine eyes.

Oh! is it not a picture fair, this happy home of ours?
'Tis drawn by Love's own arrow, and its framework is his flowers;
Whose perfumes, sweeter than themselves, survive their own decay,
If Saint Valentine hath blest of them on his own auspicious day.

[In allusion to a practice familiar on Valentine's morning in the north The lover surprises his mistress, and blindfolds her with his hands.]

Guess, and guess truly, lady mine,
Who is abroad as thy Valentine:
Whose are the fingers, and whose is the vow,
That press thy forehead, and thine eyes blessith thine now?
Love for such lore hath no need of his eyes,
To the loving the lover is known by his sighs.
Oh! for a spell on thy lips of love's art!
Say, is my name, dearest! writ on thy heart?

Surely thy soul and thy brow understand
The voice of my spirit, the clasp of my hand.
Oh! if they were not, I'd not woo thee mine mate,
That hand must be widow'd, that spirit forlorn.
This is the day when in city and grove
Love is a wanderer seeking for love.
Who is the fond one now pleading for thine?
Guess, and guess truly, my own Valentine!

THE THEATRES.

ROYAL WINDSOR THEATRICALS, AND THE PRINCESS' THEATRE.

We had lately occasion to remark that the illustrious example of her Majesty was calculated greatly to encourage the best theatrical efforts; and proof of it has been rendered in a remarkably perspicuous manner by the revival of Shakspeare's tragedy of "King John," both at Windsor Castle last Friday and at the Princess' Theatre on Monday. A previous attempts at getting up of this great historical drama have been crushed by the present example. Mr. Kean has manifested an unparalleled liberality and taste in the distribution of the parts, the scenic illustrations, the costumes, and whatever else conduces to the effective representation of an historical drama. Mr. Kean has also provided adequate representatives for all the dramatis personæ, as well as adequate representations of their whereabout and the epoch in which they flourished. His own King John is a part on which he has evidently thought much, and to which he has applied some of the best principles of the dramatic art. The repose and chivalrous feeling of the character are equally well preserved; and, notwithstanding the faults of the man, we are never permitted to forget the dignity of the Monarch. The struggle of emotion with which he tempts Hubert to the murder of Arthur is the touchstone of the actor's merit; and here Mr. Kean rose to the level of his father's genius. The manner in which he turned his eyes on the devoted boy, and the suppressed tones in which he suggested the assassination, were finely terrible and awfully suggestive. Equally effective, too, was his subsequent interview with Hubert, when reproaching him with his readiness to commit the murder, and his change of mood on finding that Arthur lived. His sickness and death were art-studies equally full of poetry and truth. To Mrs. Kean's Constance we can assign a high rank. It rose to pathos and terror; while its maternal sentiment awakened sympathy in every feeling bosom. Its beauty commanded the admiration of every judicious mind. It was exceedingly picturesque; and the manner in which she reclined on the earth, as the only fitting supporter of her great grief, was grandly conceived. Her madness was wonderful in its tenderness; and the final gust of despair heartrending in its unmitigated pathos.

We were exceedingly pleased with Miss Kate Terry's Prince Arthur, and Mr. Ryder's Hubert was of a rare excellence. Mr. Kean's Philip Faulconbridge was distinguished by all that artist's originality. In the comic portions he came out with great force, and exerted himself to give a gallant bearing to the character in a manner to merit the highest praise. The performance was decidedly successful, and must raise the management in the public estimation. Such efforts, so carried out, show that there is no real decline of the drama in England, and inspire the warmest hopes for the future.

DRURY LANE.

Gresset's poem, "Vert-Vert," the pet name of a parrot, suggested some twenty years since to M. Leuven and de Forges the subject of a vaudeville, in which the inimitable Déjazet greatly distinguished herself at the Parisian Theatre, the Palais Royal. The story of the ballet is in a nutshell. Vert-Vert, the pet parrot, dies of a surfeit of dragées and bonbons, and Brancine and the other maids of honour of the Queen transfer their affections to Corisande, who has for prosaic rival Column vs. Cascade soon introduces his boon companions, a set of merry pages, to the maids of honour, despite of the vigilance of their governess, and overcomes the scruples of Columbine, by making him intoxicated with champagne. After a series of adventures in the park and in the dormitory of the palace, there is a general marriage of the court ladies to the pages, and the ballet winds up with a grand ball.

The incidents of "Vert-Vert" are not very animated or ingenious, but the figures of some of the pas and groupings are exceedingly novel and clever. Mdlle. Plunkett's pas de deux with Durand, and their Pas Espagnol, drew down thunders of applause; and Mdlle. de la Vecchi quite sustains the glory of the Italian school.

Since the first night of "Vert Vert," on the 6th inst., it has been much curtailed in its four tableaux. Besides the pas we have specified, the "Pas des Trois Graces," danced by Mesdlles. Adèle, A. Payne, and D'Antoine; a "Pas Chinois," executed by Messrs. Marshall and some corybiers, and a galop general, are greatly applauded. It is the most effective and graceful corps de ballet that has yet been seen on an English stage. Mr W. H. Payne, as Columbus, the tutor; Mr. Marshall, as the Court ball-master; and Mdlles. Louise, Honey, and Browne, as the King's pages, render good service.

Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor" was revived on Tuesday night, with Mrs. Sims Reeves as the heroine; Mr. Whitworth, Edgardo; Mr. Manvers, Arthur; Mr. S. Jones, Raymond; and Mr. Sims Reeves, Edgar of Ravenswood. The divine melodies of this opera have given a vitality and popularity to Donizetti's work in every language, that the noblest efforts of even the libretti set to Sir Walter Scott's novel, has not in the slightest degree effected; and, however backneyed Lucia may have been in this country, it is always heard with the greatest delight. Mr. Sims Reeves's Edgar is justly regarded as one of his most effective parts, and his singing on this occasion quite sustained his reputation, the attraction of the cast being assuredly centered in himself, as, despite of the musical intelligence, taste, and feeling of his cara sposa, Lucia is beyond her physical powers.

"Robert le Diable," with Miss Crichton, Mdlle. Evelina Garcia, Mr. Manvers, Mr. Drayton, Mr. S. Jones, and M. Fédor, was repeated for the eighth time on Wednesday; and Auber's "Fra Diavolo," with Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves, Miss F. Horton, Messrs. Manvers, S. Jones, W. H. Payne, and Whitworth, for the fourth time on Thursday.

The new opera composed by Balfe, the libretto by M. de St. Georges and Mr. Bunn, is in active preparation. The action is in Sicily, and affords scope for a splendid mise en scène. The cast will comprise Miss Crichton, Miss F. Horton, Miss Rebecca Isaacs, Mr. Drayton, Mr. S. Jones, Mr. Whitworth, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Toulmin, a new baritone.

HAYMARKET.

On Saturday Mr. Barry Sullivan, of Manchester and Liverpool fame, appeared at this theatre in the part of Hamlet. In the present dearth of juvenile actors, we were sorry to find that the public took so little interest in the event, and we fear that, notwithstanding the evident merits of Mr. Sullivan, the impression produced by his greater will be exceedingly small. Weak of voice and physique, Mr. Sullivan finds it necessary to substitute mental ingenuity for force; and though, in this way, his efforts result in some new readings and novelties of acting, the absence of any adequate reason for these variations, except the actor's own want of the requisite power, deprives him of the expected appreciation. Mr. Sullivan's intelligence is remarkable, and proves the result with critical discrimination; but, unwisely, prefers readings liable to dispute, which, however in the country they may gain it a praise of cleverness for an actor, are in London held of little account. His action is, however, always elegant, and his attitudes frequently picturesque. We trust that he will prove sufficient a successful to be, at least, useful on the metropolitan boards.

OLYMPIC.

"Matrimonial, a Gentleman, &c.," is a farce by Mr. Bridgman, turning on the incident of a matrimonial advertisement in the Sunday Times. Mr. Shalde and Mr. Compton are involved in divers mistakes in consequence, and their perplexities are amusing. The piece was successful.

MARIONETTE THEATRE.

A new piece, called "The United Service," has been added to these puppet amusements, well written and containing some amusing political hits. It is in rhyme, many couplets of which are directed against the Napoleon coup d'état.

PUNCH'S THEATRE.—Mr. E. Stirling, stage-manager, has announced his benefit at this theatre for Monday, the 23d inst. The performances will commence with "Gone to Texas;" to be followed by a Concert, the "Wedding-day," &c.

WOOLWICH.—Mr. Henry Betty and Miss Edith Herand terminated their second engagement at this theatre on Saturday last, with the plays of the "Hunchback" and "Katherine and Petruchio." In the former, Miss Foote enacted Hero with great spirit and tact. On Monday and Wednesday "Hamlet" and "The Wife" were performed. In both, Miss Herand and Mr. Betty made a deep impression on the audience.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL WINTER EVENINGS.

The great and deserved success which has attended Mr. Ella in his management of the "Musical Union," and in his present undertaking the "Musical Winter Evenings," has arisen from his determination to extend instead of narrow the domain of art, by displaying novelty and variety in his programmes, and by exhibiting the productions of executants from every country in the interpretation of the different works. This system, although it may not suit the selfish and narrow-minded views of the bigoted traders in art, is approved of by the large majority of independent amateurs, to whom the musical profession must look for patronage and support. Those connoisseurs who pay for the enjoyment of music do not like to be tied down to the worship of idols. If they enter the classic concert-room, it is with the same feelings as they view the collection in a picture gallery—they have no desire to be surfeited with specimens of one school, for nature speaks many languages, and music discourses most eloquently in varied styles. In last Tuesday's scheme, being the second of the series, Mr Ella had the courage to introduce works by two rising composers, respecting whose pretensions the wordy warfare has been already sufficiently desperate. The thorough-paced professional purists, whose ideas are circumscribed within the smallest possible circle, including therein on your idols and themselves, are fearfully indignant that a Frenchman and a Dutchman should exhibit signs of musical genius.

If the very remarkable trio in C major, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, executed by the composer, M. Saïas, M. Sainton, and Signor Piatti, and the two songs "May-day" and "Venice," from the set of six Songs of France, by M. Gounod, with English words by Mr. Oxenford, and sung by the new tenor, Mr. Swift, be not inspirations out of the ordinary category of musical composition, then must the accepted notions of the ideal and inventive be altogether wrong, for both in the forms and ideas of the two composers, in the works above referred to, do we recognise all the attributes of originality, freshness, and spontaneity. In the opening allegro of the trio, the beautiful contrasts replacing the first subject is perfectly novel and ingenious. The reverse is suggestive of Mendelssohn, but the treatment is piquant and in Saïas's own manner; the andante, with its singing solo for the violoncello, and a very fiery finale, are movements replete with marked originality. The chief defect we find in the trio is its length; the imagination of youth is prolific, and the tact of concentration must be acquired by experience. The gifted composer was enthusiastically called for at the end of the trio.

We have mentioned the songs of Gounod on other occasions; Miss Dolby has been singing some of them, particularly the Hunting Song, with immense success: the two selected by Mr. Swift are exceedingly beautiful, particularly the "Venice," the proportions of which are grand and impressive, and to the musical accompaniment of which only four hands can do adequate justice. Mr. Swift also sang Mendelssohn's elegant song, "By Celia's arbour," which was re-demanded.

The remainder of the programme included Mozart's Quintet in A and Spohr's Nonetto in F, Op. 31, in which the abilities of M. Sainton, Mr. A. Mellon, first and second violins; Mr. Hill, viola; Signor Piatti, violoncello; Mr. Pratten contrabasso; Signor Briccialdi, flute; Mr. Nicholson, oboe; Mr. Lazarus, clarionet; Mr. C. Harper, horn; and Mr. Baumann, bassoon, were called into play.

MUSICAL EVENTS.

The English Glee and Madrigal Union gave their fourth concert, the last of the present series, at Willis's Rooms, on Monday night. Mrs. Anderson, Miss Williams, Messrs. Lockey, Land, Francis, and Phillips sang at the party of the Count and Countess of Morella (Cabrera) last week. On Thursday the Union sang in aid of the funds of the Marylebone Literary and Scientific Institution.

The third of the City Wednesday Concerts took place on the 11th, under M. Billet's direction. The chief artistes were the Misses Poole, Cundell, Lyles, Bassano; Messrs. G. Tedder and Cotton; Mr. Lavigne, oboeist; the Coehns, guitarists; Herr Jansa, violinist; Herr Schmidt, M. and G. Lütgen.

The twelfth and last soirée of the Harmonic des Arts took place on Wednesday, at the Queen Anne-street Rooms, Madame and Herr Goffrie, Herr Schmidt, Mr. Bosse, Mr. Goodban, Mdlle. Magner, Mdme. Lemaire, and the Misses M'Alpine, aiding in the performance. On the 20th inst. a soirée will be given for the benefit of the directors, Herr Goffrie and Herr Goldmark.

At Salaman's Amateur Choral Society, on Wednesday, Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was executed.

The Sacred Harmonic Society performed last night, under Costa's direction, for the second time, Mendelssohn's "Elijah," with Mr. Brownsmith as organist, and Mr. Cooper principal violin. The vocalists were Mrs. Endersohn, Miss Amy Doloy, Miss Williams, Mr. Miss Williams, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Walker, Mr. Smythson, Mr. A. Novello, and Mr. Whitworth.

Mr. Brinley Richards, the pianist and composer, performed at the Town-hall, Carmarthen, last Wednesday, for the benefit of the Infirmary.

A morning concert, in aid of the families of the crew of the Amazon, was given at the Town-hall, Brighton, last Saturday, by Madame Oury, the accomplished pianiste, aided by Mr. Oury, violinist; Piatti, violoncellist, the Misses Pyne, and Herr Reichardt, the German tenor.

THE ARMY OF THE POPE.—Accounts from Rome of the 31st ultimo, says the Débats, state that the Austrian Government has just offered to the Pontifical Government such great facilities for the creation of a Roman army, that what measure may now be considered as definitively decided on. The effective strength of the Pontifical troops was raised up to a strength of 5,000 men, 4000 of whom are already enrolled. A battalion of foot chasseurs, of from 1200 to 1500 strong, a regiment of dragoons, and one or two brigades of artillery, will complete this force of 20,000 men. The 15,000 gendarmes, the 5000 Swiss and Germans, and the battalion of chasseurs commanded by M. Alderon-Polombia, an officer devoted to the Holy See, will form an effective force which will insure the safety of the two native regiments, and will put to the Pontifical Government to protect itself with its own troops. The formation and support of this army will entail fresh charges on the Treasury. The necessary outlay is estimated at about 2,000,000 piastres, which is just about the amount of the deficit of last year. Some Roman subjects, who had joined in a more or less active manner the Roman revolution, but who had received permission to remain in the Holy City, have just received orders to quit immediately the Roman States. Some new names have also been added to the list of such of the inhabitants as cannot leave their houses before sunrise or remain out of them after sunset.

POSTAGE OF BOOKS, &c.—By a Treasury warrant, dated Feb. 6, 1852, in pursuance of the 14th Victoria, it is ordered that printed books, magazines, &c., whether British, colonial, or foreign, posted in the United Kingdom and directed to Ceylon, or posted in Ceylon and directed to the United Kingdom, may be transmitted under the following regulation: Not exceeding half a pound weight to be charged 6d.; not exceeding a pound, 1s.; not exceeding two pounds, 2s; not exceeding 3 pounds, 3s; for every additional pound, or fraction of a pound, 1s. extra. The dimensions of each package not to exceed two feet in length or breadth. The postage to be prepaid by stamps affixed outside, near the address. The warrant to come into operation on the 1st of March.

LAUNCH OF A NEW STEAM-VESSEL.—On Tuesday was launched, from Mr. Patterson's yard, Bristol, a new steam vessel, called the America. She was planned and designed by Mr. Thomas Morgan, for many years the consulting engineer and naval architect to the American Lloyd's Steam Company, and was built by Mr. Patterson, the builder of the Great Western, Great Britain, &c. The America has been visited during her construction by many eminent engineers, shipbuilders, and other gentlemen, as well as nautical gentlemen, by whom she has uniformly been awarded the palm for beauty of model, and for a rare combination of great strength with comparative lightness. Her engines have been constructed by Messrs. Miller, Ravenhill, and Sackold, on the oscillating principle, with the feathering paddle-wheels, known as Morgan's paddle-wheels, and will be erected in the vessel at Bristol. The America was christened by Miss Ellman, daughter of one of the directors.

The Russian Government has declined connecting the St. Petersburg-Warsaw railway with the Great Prussian Eastern railway, now being built, from Berlin to Konigsberg. Russia is too intent on cutting off all connexion between its subjects and the population of Western Europe, to allow its confines to be crossed by locomotives.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.—SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.—On Monday night a meeting of the members of the Royal Geographical Society was held at their house in Whitehall-place, for the purpose of receiving the report of Lieut. Pim, R.N., read a paper on the unsuccessful search for Sir John Franklin. Mr. Pim commenced that he was induced to undertake the necessity of expedition on account of the deep interest he felt in the fate of the gallant navigator, and the anxiety which was universally felt for his safety. He then described the equipment of the expedition, which consisted of the Resolute and Intrepid, two Government steamers, each of 400 tons burden, and provisioned for three years. Lieut. Pim then described the various ports at which they touched on their way to Behring's Straits, and the incidents which occurred during the voyage. He then described the search which was made by the expedition in the Arctic regions, and the various discoveries which were made by the different parties. At the conclusion of the reading of the paper, Lieut. Pim was loudly applauded. Sir Roderick Murchison, the President, then addressed the meeting, and said that Lieut. Pim had now volunteered to join the Arctic expedition, and that he had been appointed by Her Majesty's Government, under the command of Captain Kellett, to the Herald. Sir Roderick said, the meeting must feel with him a natural feeling of anxiety on account of the dangers which Lieut. Pim was about to encounter, and he was sure that they would join him in the hope that the gallant officer would return safe and well from the perilous service in which he was engaged. Sir Roderick then proposed a vote of thanks to Lieut. Pim for his interesting paper, which was carried by acclamation. Lieut. Pim returned thanks, and the meeting separated.

CHINA, AND ANCIENT AND MODERN POTTERY.—A highly interesting lecture was delivered on Wednesday evening, at the Southwark Literary Institution, by Mr. Alexis Soyer, on China, and showing its modern progress. He interspersed his illustrations with historical notices of the progress of the arts, from its earliest cultivation in China down to modern times, exhibiting specimens of the most elegant productions of the ancient and modern manufactories. It was a curious fact, that the Chinese were the first to introduce the use of glass among them. Europe by accident, being the result of the discovery and adoption of the fifteenth century, one of whom, imprisoned by the then King of Saxony in the castle of Favenza, had used the foundation of the celebrated manufactories in that country. The lecture was listened to throughout with great attention, and Mr. Felix was loudly applauded at the close.

ROYAL GENERAL ANNUITY SOCIETY.—The anniversary festival was held on Wednesday evening, at the London Tavern, in Bishopsgate-street, when Mr. Coote, jun., presided, and Mr. Alderman Wilson, M.P., was the vice-chairman. About seventy gentlemen sat down to dinner. The chairman, in the course of the evening, stated that they had now 1,000 annuitants receiving their funds, and had distributed during the past year £1200, being an increase of £1000 upon the last year. The subscriptions and donations were announced to amount to about £300.

GOLDSMITHS' BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—On Tuesday the goldsmiths gave their annual festival at Willis's-rooms, which, for the good their benevolent institution, which has numerously and fashionably attended. The music was by Messrs. Coote and Tinney, and the band of the Royal Artillery performed select pieces between the dances. The proceeds of the former ban, we are glad to learn, were most liberal in placing among the applicants at the last election as annuitants on the funds of the institution.

TITHE REDEMPTION TRUST.—The Board of the Tithe Redemption Trust held their quarterly meeting on Tuesday, at their offices, No. 1, Lancaster-place, Waterloo-bridge, when several applications were considered, and them for assistance in redeeming for alienated tithes, and restoring them to the Church. The Board considered the applications from two of the parishes were so important, that, notwithstanding the assessments were not yet made, they had determined to grant pledging assistance to the extent of an immediate remittance of the sum of their awarded tithes, which, added together to a sum already in hand for a fund.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN DIVIDEND.—It is stated that the directors will recommend a dividend at the rate of six per cent., and that about £50,000 will be carried forward to the "rest."

LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.—On Thursday the half-yearly meeting of the company was held at the Nine Elms station, the Right Hon. Lord Mahon in the chair. The report of the directors was read, and a dividend of 4½ per cent for the last year declared, a very satisfactory statement being rendered of the future prospects of the company. Three retiring directors being put in nomination for re-election, three other gentlemen, Mr. Sergeant Gazelee, Mr. Philips, and Mr. Mortimer, were proposed in opposition to them. The show of hands was in favour of the retiring directors, and a poll was demanded, which was to take place on Friday and Saturday, the election of the remaining directors to be postponed until Wednesday next. The western extensions were again brought before the meeting, and the proposal was that the coast and the eastern side were remitted to the directors for further consideration. The meeting, which lasted seven hours, was concluded by a vote of thanks to the chairman.

The balance of £83,000 to credit of which £1,334 14 4d has been carried to the renewal fund has therefore recommended the payment of a dividend at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, and that the balance of £1,077 7s 1d be carried forward to the credit of the current half-year.

GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.—On Thursday the half-yearly meeting of this company was held at the Paddington station; Charles Russell, Esq., in the chair. The report stated that the receipts for the half-year, compared with the same period last year, showed an increase of £4,000 in the receipts of passengers, £1,000 in parcels, £2,000 in goods, and a saving in expenses of £6,000, making a total increase of £13,000, which had produced an addition of £6,000 to the net profits. The result of the half year enabled the directors to recommend a dividend of two and a half per cent, for the last half year. This reserved a balance to be carried over, which the directors considered sufficient to secure a dividend on the ordinary rateable stock of the company of at least 4 per cent, per annum from the time when the purchase of the Birmingham and Oxford and Birmingham and Gloucester railways should be completed, and the capital be charged against revenue. A report had been made by the engineer, Mr. Brunel, on the state of the permanent way and rolling stock, and the directors re-elected, and, after a vote of thanks to the chairman, the meeting separated.

THE MILITIA AND THE NATIONAL DEFENCES.

It suits the purpose of some of those well-meaning but impracticable persons who believe offensive and defensive war to be alike unjustifiable and wicked, to assert that a "panic" has been recently got up on the subject of our national defences. Mr. Hume talks of "old women" having been frightened; and Mr. Cobden—who has, unfortunately for his reputation, suffered himself to be betrayed into the advocacy of ultra-peace principles—does his best to ridicule the idea that there are powers and potentates in Europe whose wickedness and ambition are sufficient to produce a general war. Fortunately those who agree in opinion with Mr. Cobden and the members of the estimable Society of Friends upon these points are very few and very uninfluential, and may be safely left to the quiet indulgence of their own notions. The Society of Friends are not likely to convert the people of this great nation into a flock of spiritless and witless sheep, ignorant of the existence of, and powerless to defend themselves against, the human wolves and other wild beasts that might feel inclined to attack them. The "Friends" may believe in an actually present millennium if they please, but we are a practical people, and have no time, and scarcely patience, for Utopianism. As for Mr. Cobden, though likely enough to imperil his own return to the next Parliament, he is not likely to do any damage to the country by the course he has for some time pursued upon this subject. The people of this kingdom have eyes to see and intelligence to understand what is the real position of Europe. They neither shut their eyes against danger nor exaggerate it when aware of it. There is not the slightest "panic" among any class, whatever Mr. Hume, Mr. Cobden, and the Peace Society may say to the contrary; but a quiet, business-like comprehension of events, and a cool, steady, determination to be prepared for whatever may happen. The nation detests war, but it knows full well that war is not the worst evil that can befall a civilized community. It feels that the loss of honour or of liberty is infinitely worse than war; and that the man, or nation, who would submit to either rather than take the trouble to defend it, is a base man, or a base nation, unworthy of respect, and destined to fill the lowest place in the great scale of society. It feels, also, that an unarmed and defenceless traveller is more likely to be attacked by a highwayman than the man who is known to carry a good "revolver," and to be courageous and expert in the use of it; and that a good policeman is a greater safeguard against an evildoer than a score of lectures upon the folly of "kicking up a row" or the sinfulness of breaking into a dwelling-house.

The debate, or rather conversation, that took place in the House of Commons on Monday night was, in general, a very fair reflex of the public feeling on this interesting question. The only gentlemen who objected to an increase of the means of national defence at the present time were the two we have mentioned. Whatever differences of opinion were elicited among others, including men of all parties and shades of party, were differences as to the details, and by no means as to the principle; and when Lord John Russell, in the name of the Administration, proposed that a militia force should be raised throughout England, the feeling was not that his Lordship had asked too much, but that he had asked too little.

It appears from this debate, that a force of 5000 men, including 1000 artillerymen, is to be added to the regular army; that a large portion of our fleet now doing duty, or pretending to do duty, in remote parts of Europe and of the world is to be called home; and that every means will be taken to improve the arms and accoutrements of our force. Mr. Cobden is of opinion that these measures are sufficient, if not more than sufficient, to insure our lives, liberties, and property against all possible invasion or attack; and that we are paying, and have paid, too much for the actual services rendered by our army and navy. Possibly Mr. Cobden is right in the latter assertion; but, whether or not, there can be no reason why we should not make the most of the defences we have, whether these defences be ships, or fortresses, or brave men. But we think Mr. Cobden will find few people to agree with him in the opinion that it would be wise policy to trust implicitly in the navy alone, even under the most effective and improved system, or that it is an act of "flagrant injustice" to call out men from "their manufactories and shops, where they are earning four shillings a day, and to pay them one and sixpence for acting as militiamen." It is curious, though not astonishing, to see how prejudice dulls the clearest intellects. Mr. Cobden might as well assert that it is an act of "flagrant injustice" to call a quiet citizen from his shop, where he may be earning a guinea a day, and pay him eightpence for sitting as a juror on a coroner's inquest. If the public safety, honour, or convenience require either the militiamen or the juror, men must be called to fulfil the duty, independently of all considerations of money. Were the affairs of this country conducted upon such sordid principles as these, there would be an end of law and of national independence at the same time. Happily, such sentiments are not common; and, were there any real danger, there would, we have no doubt, be hundreds of thousands of men ready to leave their manufactories and shops, not simply for eightpence a day, but from a sense of duty and a feeling of patriotism. We are not so base and degraded a people as those might consider us who had no other means of forming an opinion of us than such a speech as Mr. Cobden's. But we will do Mr. Cobden the justice to believe, that on calm reflection he would not so belie the national character, and that he himself, as an Englishman, is not so sordid as he would represent his countrymen to be. Nay, we have no doubt that he would turn out cheerfully in case of need, his sword at his side, or his revolver in his hand, forgetting alike the Peace Society and his own crotchets, and thinking of nothing but the most effectual way of killing the greatest number of invaders.

But the House of Commons cannot be said to have received this proposition of the Government with much favour. The reason, however, is not difficult to discover. The re-establishment of the militia is not thought to be extensive or effective enough for the object in view. The militia proposed is to be local, not general; in other words, its services will only be available within the limits of the several counties in which it is raised. Lord Palmerston, who has spoken out on this question with an energy that recalls his best days, and which, if continued, will make him a formidable opponent of the Ministry, is of opinion that the old general militia of the last war, or, in fact, a garde mobile, to be despatched to any part of the country where its services may be needed, would be the proper kind of force to organize; and has already given notice of a motion to that effect, which, unless no accident intervene to change the position of the Ministry, will be discussed on Monday. It is also objected by Lord Palmerston, and by the Irish members, that it is an error not to make the bill applicable to Ireland—a portion of the United Kingdom more peculiarly exposed to attack. Some of the Irish members consider the exemption of Ireland as an insult to that country, or a mistrust of it. It was, however, explained that nothing of the kind is intended; that Scotland, as well as Ireland, is excluded from the bill; and that Ireland already possesses a constabulary force of nearly 12,000 men—all Irishmen, or for the most part so—whose services in case of danger will be found of the highest value. But this objection is one which the Government will not think it worth while to combat, if the Legislature should think there is any weight in it. What the country does, it ought to do well; and for our part we cannot discover why such a measure as this, supposing it to be useful at all, should be confined to a part only.

With its usual cowardice, or timidity, the Ministry prefers small measures to large ones, and likes tinkering much better than construction. It loves to throw a responsibility on Parliament which it ought to take upon itself, and will no doubt continue to do so until it ceases to be a Ministry. Yet we gather from the discussions that have already arisen, that whatever may be the fate of the Administration—vulnerable as it is on so many points—a militia as good or more effective than that proposed will be forthwith organized. War is made more imminent than it would otherwise be, by our defencelessness; and whether we find it convenient or not, we cannot be indifferent to the fate of the kingdoms of the Continent—or neutral, should a war arise. It is not alone a descent upon our coasts, which no one considers probable, that would call this nation to arms, but an attack, unfortunately but too probable, upon the independence or the territory of Switzerland, Prussia, or Belgium, that would force us, whether we liked it or not, to throw our whole weight against the aggressor. When the day comes that the states of the Continent shall make war upon each other in defiance of England, her arms, or her remonstrances, it may be a happy day for Mr. Cobden, but on that day the downfal of the great English nation will have commenced. Mr. Cobden may think, if "England allows herself to be dragged into the affairs of the Continent, she will richly deserve the calamity of bankruptcy." But the sound heart of the country knows that when England has lost all influence in the battles of the Continent, bankruptcy will not only have been deserved, but will have been consummated.

DESTRUCTION OF LAGOS, ON THE COAST OF AFRICA.

BY THE BRITISH SQUADRON.

Accounts have been received during the week, announcing the almost total destruction of the town of Lagos by the boats of the British squadron on the 26th and 27th of December, the English vessels sustaining a loss of 25 killed and 71 wounded, five of whom died subsequently, making in all 30 killed. The ships engaged in the attack were the Penelope, Bloodhound, Sampson, and Teaser; and the great loss of the English squadron was occasioned by the Bloodhound having grounded on a sandbank within range of a battery of 18 guns.

These are the general facts; the details of the affair are presented with graphic force in the following communication from an obliging Correspondent, an officer who was engaged in the action.

The hostile proceedings were undertaken in consequence of the refusal of the King or Chief of Lagos to sign a treaty for the effectual suppression of the slave trade in his dominions, which was strongly interposed to attack the place, and, after two days' fighting, the object was accomplished and the place nearly destroyed, an immense number of the natives being killed. The Chief, or King, has also been deposed, and another substituted. The wounded on the side of the British in the action are stated to be doing well.

(From our Correspondent.)

Dec 24, 1851.—Busily employed preparing for the expedition; filling shells, cutting fuzes, arming and provisioning boats, &c. Sampson's two paddle-box boats, each with a 24-lb howitzer, one pinnace, mounting a 12-lb howitzer, two cutters, and a gig, followed the Bloodhound across the bar last night, to aid in protecting both the vessel and the friendly blacks, who are marked with a white band of calico round their throats, to enable us to tell friend from foe. At 10 A.M. the Bloodhound, with Sampson's boats, under the immediate command of Captain Jones of that vessel (Sampson), proceeded slowly up the river, blazing away at the bush on pursuant, the bar being warm, returned. The vessel steamed on, to endeavour to make the enemy fire their long 24-lb. gun at her, that its range might be ascertained, which soon took place. Teaser sighted her first at two o'clock, and the boats (eight in number) moved off at three o'clock; Captain Lyster in command of our division, on board Teaser—the surgeon and assistants also accompanying the expedition. The little Teaser and our boats having crossed the bar together, the two or three rapidly up the river to the assistance of her comrade; and they both anchored out of range of the enemy's guns for the night.

25th, Christmas-day. No firing this morning; thought it strange; however, the mystery was cleared up by a gig belonging to the Sampson coming on board, and bringing the news that the enemy had night previous burned the Rapid hound and the tents covering other boats that chased and captured several large canoes, for the purpose of transporting Akitoye's men to-day from their position on the west bank of the river to the opposite side. Lieut. Leonard shot 40 of them. There were four guns of the enemy that opened fire on them. Since the first attack, a month ago, the natives, assisted and guided by a troop of rascal Portuguese and Brazilians, had cleverly stockaded with cocoa-nut trees; they had a 68-pounder by a gunboat's launch. He (the gunner) stated that the natives came down in thousands.

26th.—At ten minutes to six this morning we first heard firing, both from great guns and musketry. The Teaser had slipped her position from the bar, and the Bloodhound was out of sight. Rapid discharges were continually heard. At ten minutes to nine we heard a very loud report, and observed a thick cloud of smoke rising in the direction of the town. At nine the firing appeared to slacken, and by eleven nothing was heard but the report of an occasional gun. At two P.M., firing, both from great guns and musketry, recommenced with increased activity: discharge and continuous. Our surmises (for we were at anchor) as to the suspension of hostilities for more than two hours was to allow the enemy to recruit, or that the morning's work had for a time disabled the enemy. The Teaser remained in her position all night. Various conjectures as to the strength of our men slack we have, she reported that the Waterwitch was blown off from her moorings in Badagry river, and was driven to sea, where she remained for three days, burning fiercely; the steamer shelling and shooting, to prevent the enemy from extinguishing it. At 3 P.M. some of the Sampson's paddle-box boats came alongside, bearing twenty of the most severely wounded. The coxswain of some of the guns that we captured afterwards consisted of 15 or 16 inches of powder, a case of lacerating compound of pieces of iron, the case formed of tin, similar to that used in our service, wooden bottom, &c. complete; then a wad of cocoa-nut leaves, a few lengths of large hoop iron, and a wad of cocoa-nut leaves on all. They were all prepared, and accompanied the gig's boat where the Teaser grounded. When the Teaser weighed on the morning of the 26th, she grounded on a shoal opposite the lower stockade, where was mounted a 12-pounder, which commanded the entrance of the river. People were employed for three or four hours laying out anchors, and endeavouring to get the vessel afloat; until our Captain, observing that the enemy were both large down larger and larger, he (the gunner) said, "My men, those guns must be taken; man the boats and follow me." They formed in line, and advanced steadily towards the shore, keeping up a fire from the guns and musketry, which was returned with the utmost vigour; the natives yelling hideously, and beating their tom-toms; the canoes carrying red umbrellas, encouraging them by shaking them at us, leaning over their guns, and flirting their arms upwards, praying that the shot might be directed properly. There were numbers of Mussulmans inciting the people to fight. The port paddle-box boat was on the left of the division, and the second cutter had strict orders to remain to cover the boats, each boat with three men in to keep her. Poor Fletcher, one of our midshipmen, was shot in the head while in this boat. The boats grounded, men charging (after storming up the entire breach, eight feet in height, driving the enemy from the trenches, behind the stockades, of ore thousands had been taking shelter from our fire, affording them good opportunities for a true aim; but our shell, &c. burst so accurately, that their numbers were greatly thinned; yet legions came to supply their place. However, we drove them from the first trench, when they retreated sixty or seventy yards to the inner one and the bush, keeping up an incessant fire; and, in the meantime, Lieutenant Corbett, in the most gallant manner, rushed up to the two guns and drove a spike into each of them. The purpose being effected, the men returned to the boats, well covered by the marine artillerymen. Immediately the enemy saw that our backs were turned they poured out from their hiding-place in thousands, keeping up an incessant fire. Then the bloody work commenced. They came down to the left of the stockade, rushing into the port paddle-box boat, and, finding but four men in it, instantly killed three of them, clearing breast high, as I can say, with a large hooked broadswords. The fourth, after saving his head with his left arm, jumped overboard and swam to another boat. He first cutter instantly pushed off to the rescue with a 12-lb. rocket into the magazine of the captured boat, blown it up and 30 or 40 of the natives that were in it. The Kroomen that were left in Mr. Beecroft's vessel had jumped overboard, having previously dropped a stern anchor, so that when her crew could not get her clear they were duly obliged to cut at last to cut the cable, which they accomplished with great difficulty, it being an iron one. This delay was the cause of her suffering so severely. The remaining paddle-box boat, commanded by Lieut. Dale, did great service; never for an instant slackening her heavy, well-directed fire, doing fearful execution among the crowds that were on the beach delivering their fire, and remaining to reload within a dozen yards of our boats. All but the boats got off, with the loss of 7 killed and 70 wounded, 7 of whom are since dead. This heavy loss was effected in less than ten minutes; and it is a miraculous thing how the others escaped unhurt, for the odds against us were tremendous. Shortly after three, the Teaser got off, running the gauntlet of the other batteries without having a man hurt. The Bloodhound had weighed immediately before the Teaser did in the morning, just outside on the shoal, and proceeded without delay off the town, the Sampson's boats with her; on account of the smoke caused by the encampment she could not discern whether the Teaser was following her or not; therefore, while the Teaser and our boats were engaged with the enemy on shore, the Bloodhound and the Sampson's boats were endeavouring to effect a landing off the west part of the town, but fortunately

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

TUESDAY, Feb 19 1852.

Lord Normanby has been busily occupied since his return to Paris in receiving and paying farewell visits. It is said that little or none of the cordiality which formerly existed between the noble Ambassador and the Elysée now prevails—an alienation which creates no surprise. The report that the noble Marquis is going out to India has gained additional strength since his return We are all earnestly looking out for Lord Cowley, our newly-appointed Ambassador, whose presence is, in many respects, thought to be desirable in the present state of affairs. He comes strongly recommended by the recollections of his father, who was here during the last Administration of Sir Robert Peel, and left behind him but one regret, that his mission among us was of such brief duration.

Balls have been rife this week, particularly in official quarters. At the private ball given by the President of the Republic, the presence of the impetuous patisan of the elder branch, M. de Rochejaquelin, occasioned no little surprise. The principal réunion of the week, however, has been that of the Minister of War, General St. Arnaud, where it is estimated that no less than 5000 persons were present. The arrivals commenced at eight o'clock, and carriages did not cease to pour into the courtyard of the Hôtel until after twelve o'clock. The singular decorations of the principal salon excited much attention, partaking much more of the nature of an arsenal than an apartment devoted to Terpsichore. The walls were covered with swords of all forms and ages—lances, arbalastes, and the rowel-arquebus, mingling with the formidable Minié rifle, the common musket, and bayonet. Old armour and stands of arms occupied the corners of the apartments, while an immense chandelier hung from the centre, bristling with all the implements of war. The floor-hinges were simulated ordnance of a large calibre, and over the mantelpiece a noble lion-king-at-arms, in the form of the star of the Legion of Honour, reflected back all the military decorations a thousandfold. A spectator might well have exclaimed with the poet—

> Nudi sgræ Mavortis ferri
> Ingeminat splendore diem

At this réunion the Ministers and some members of the Conseil d'Etat sported their new official costumes, cut according to ordre. They are simply abominations—the stiffness and vulgar glitter of the Empire, without a redeeming ray of its genius or glory to preserve it from ridicule. These bedizened costumes are decidedly another mistake in the new régime.

Among the private balls the first place must be assigned to that given by the Marchioness of Douglas, or, as she is more generally termed here, La Princesse Marie de Baden: the company was select, and comprised the fleur, decus, et honos of French and foreign aristocracy. Next must be ranked the smaller and exclusive réunions of the Princesse de Craon, Mdme. de Gouy, the Count René de Boulle, the Marquise des Portes, the Marquise de Pommereux, whose supper table displayed a service of gold plate, valued, it is said, at 300,000,000 of francs; the incredulous part of the world, however, consider it as silver-gilt, and estimate it at 2,000,000f. (80,000*l.*). The balls of Mdme. Heine, Messrs. Oller (the bankers), and a sumptuous entertainment last night at Viscount d'Arlincourt's, with theatricals, a concert, dancing, and a supper worthy Frimalchio, conclude the list of festivities of the last week but one of Carnival.

The pretty little comedy of "Madame de la Seiglière," by one of those lucky chances which sometimes affect the fortune of plays as well as greater matters, has suddenly become a perfect rage in Paris. The piece, as I believe I mentioned on its first coming out, has for its principal personage an old émigré Marquis, whose bête noire is the Emperor Napoleon, just then deposed, and whose comments upon "Monsieur de Bonaparte" tonnés tell with sting ng effect up n the politics of the day. Such is its attraction that it is now acted at intimately with Rachel three times a week, with the theatre crowded to suffocation. It was rather a favourite from the first, but the coup d'état, and above all the enforced silence of the journals, have now given it an éclat which the genius of Molière himself would not have produced for it. It must of course be understood that there is at least as much malice as pleasure in the frenetic plaudits bestowed upon it. I send you one of the most piquant passages:—

Marquis.—He, he! This Monsieur de Bonsparte of yours! A strange fellow! Never could comprehend him. No telling what the devil he was ever about. Sly dog, sir! Sly dog! (Roars.)

Bernard.—A great man, sir. Very dead indeed.

Marquis.—Think so? I'm told he's very stupid, and obstinate as a mule. But who the deuce is he? A nobody! To thrust himself into the Tuileries! (Shouts of laughter.) Into the palaces of our ancient kings!

Bernard.—What will you? This is the land of revolutions. We see such things every day.

Marquis.—Well, it's to be hoped now he's settled for some little time. I trust we shall see no more of his pranks. He has kept us long enough in hot water.

Imagine all this, delivered in a theatre crowded with enemies, or, what is much the same thing, "candid friends," with all the finesse and quiet significance that a man of wit and a consummate comedian like Samson can throw into every sentence, and you have some idea of the effect produced upon the most impressionable public in the world.

A skilful feat was accomplished this week at the Parisian chess-club, the Café de la Régence. M. Kieseritzky, a distinguished master of the noble game, offered the club not only to play a game without seeing the board, against any opponent they might appoint, but to checkmate him accepted, and at the 74th move the King of M. Keseritzky's adversary on a square which he would previously point out. The challenge was was mated on the square previously indicated, to the unanimous applause of all present. The game lasted three hours.

FRANCE.

"Legislation by decree" is carried on with great vigour by the Executive of the "Prince President;" and the unproductiveness of last week in this respect is fully compensated by the fruitfulness of the present.

The Organic Law of the Press has made its appearance; and any ordinance of a more restrictive character, consistently with the existence of political journalism, could not well be promulgated in the present age.

The "freedom of the press" is a dismal farce in a country where a law exists which enables the Executive, by its mere fiat—simply by decree—to suppress a journal, without previous condemnation. The law was published in the Moniteur on Wednesday, and is divided into four chapters, containing thirty-seven articles. Its principal provisions are as follow:—

"No paper may be established without Government authority.

"Political newspapers published in foreign countries will not be allowed to circulate in France without Government authority.

"Persons introducing or distributing a foreign paper without such authority are to be punished with imprisonment varying from one month to one year, and a fine of from 100f. to 5000f.

"The caution-money of a paper appearing more than thrice a week to be 80,000f.

"All publication of a paper without authority, or without lodging the caution-money, is to be punished with a fine of from 100f. to 2000f. for each number, and imprisonment of from one month to two years.

"The stamp duties imposed on newspapers are also applicable to foreign newspapers, unless they are exempted under a diplomatic convention.

"A journal may be suppressed without previous condemnation, by decree of the Executive.

"It is forbidden to publish reports of trials for press offences. The Courts may prohibit publicat on of other trials.

"The prefect designates the journal in which judicial advertisements must be inserted."

The law is to come into operation on the 1st of March next. The only modification of its provisions, as finally decided upon after much deliberation, was the abolition, on the application of the Society of Literary men to the Minister of the Interior, of the stamp of one centime on the feuilleton, or tales and romances which appear at the foot of the page in all French journals.

Another decree, issued on Monday, gives the coup de grâce to the Revolution of 1848 and the associations attached to it, while it is pregnant with indications of the coming Empire. This edict abolishes the national fêtes of Feb. 24 and May 1, and substitutes as the only anniversary worthy of commemoration the birthday of the Emperor Napoleon. It is as follows:—

Louis Napoleon, President of the French Republic,

Considering that the celebration of political anniversaries recals the remembrance of civil discords, and that among the fêtes it is a duty to choose that the consecration of which the best tends to unite all minds in the common sentiment of national glory,

Decrees,

Art 1. For the future, the only fête to be recognised and celebrated as a national one shall be the anniversary of the 15th of August (the fête day of the Emperor Napoleon).

Art. 2 All former laws contrary to the present decree are hereby abrogated.

Art 3. The Ministers are charged, each as far as it concerns them, with the execution of this decree.

The President has also ordered by decree the creation of a special museum at the Louvre, for the reception of all objects which can authentically be proved to have belonged to the Sovereigns who have reigned in France, and which are now distributed among the different museums belonging to the state.

Decrees on the subject of import and export duties in the French colonies have likewise appeared, by which importations to Senegal in French ships are chargeable with two francs per cent. duty; on foreign ships, four francs per ton; and exports must be sent in French ship and for French ports. Trade amongst the colonists is only to be carried in French ships; and, according to a report of the Minister of Marine, measures are in contemplation for encouraging the immigration of free labour into the colonies.

Finally, there is an order from the Minister of the Interior regulating the changes to be made in the costume of the Prefects, Sub-Prefects, Mayors, and other public functionaries.

The Press states that the differences with Switzerland, with respect to their refugees will be settled amicably through General Dufour.

Louis Napoleon seems anxious to show that the sus icions entertained in England and other countries of Europe, as to the continuance of his hitherto pacific policy, are not well founded, and accordingly the official organ of the Government has published a "communicated" note, which denounces as calumnious the warlike intentions attributed by English journals to the President of the Republic, and declares that no menacing note has been addressed to any government, nor has the army been increased by one soldier. The views of the Executive, it adds, are turned exclusively to internal ameliorations.

The existing state of the relations between the French and Russian Governments has been the subject of much conversation and rumour in the political circles of Paris during the week. It is understood that a strong remonstrance has been addressed by the Government of the Czar to that of the President, through the medium of the Russian Minister at Paris, expressive of his Imperial Majesty's dissatisfaction at the rapid strides which Louis Napoleon is taking towards establishing himself as Emperor of France The Czar, it appears, is regarding Louis Napoleon's tenure of power as temporary and ancillary to the restoration of the former Monarch. The terms of the note are stated to be that the Emperor Nicholas has seen with a feeling of deep dissatisfaction certain decrees that emanated from the President of the Republic soon after the publication of the results of the vote of December the 20th and 21st: the act which substitutes the Imperial eagle for the Gallic cock on the standards of the Republic; that which establishes the effigy of the President on the coinage, and, finally, that which transfers the presidential residence from the Elysée to the Tuileries. It is added, that the re-establishment of the Imperial Constitution of the year VIII. was also received by the Emperor with pretty much the same feeling His Imperial Majesty saw in these successive acts, more or less significative, preliminaries of the pure and simple re-establishment of another Imperial era, to which nothing, not even the pretension of founding a new dynasty, was wanting.

To this very plain-spoken document Louis Napoleon's Government has returned a reply, which is stated to be of a somewhat angry character; and so the matter rests for the present.

His Excellency Lord Cowley, the new British Ambassador to the French Republic, arrived in Paris on Tuesday night, and the Marquis of Normanby has returned to London.

The Duchess of Orleans has addressed the following letter to the President, refusing the dotation of 300,000f. per annum maintained to her in the decree of January 22:—

Monsieur, As I do not acknowledge your right to plunder my family, neither do I acknowledge your right to assign to me a dotation in the name of France.

UNITED STATES.

The latest intelligence from New York this week is to the 7th inst.

From Congress we learn that Mr. Case had moved a resolution in the Senate to the effect that the British Government be requested in favour of the liberation of the Irish exiles. A long discussion on the question was expected previous to any decision being come to upon it.

In the Senate, on the 5th, a fracas occurred, during which a member had his nose broken

A petition had been presented from Charles Wilkes, of the United States Navy, asking for an appropriation of 500,000 dollars for an effective exploration of the Arctic seas in search of Sir John Franklin.

In the House of Representatives a resolution had been passed appropriating 5000 dollars for relieving and bringing home the remnant of the Lopez expedition at present in Spain.

A large State temperance convention was held in Concord, New Hampshire, on the 30th ult., at which it was resolved to support no candidate for office who was not in favour of prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors

Kossuth had delivered at Pittsburgh a lengthy speech to some dissenting clergy, in reply to an address from their body. He afterwards proceeded to Cleveland, and then to Columbus, Ohio, where he was still sojourning, on the 6th inst., from a severe cold. In some parts of the country the Hungarian chief was by no means regarded with favour. The Massachusetts abolitionists, in convention, had, for instance, resolved that he was a traitor to humanity and false to his fame, for slighting honourable principles; whilst, in Pittsburgh, Bishop O'Connor had also denounced his proceedings. Count Batthyany's letter to the Times had elicited a reply from M. Pulszky

An earthquake had been experienced in Tennessee.

Captain Jonas P. Levy had been arrested for heading an unlawful correspondence with the Mexican Government, for the purpose of frustrating and rendering null the Tehuantepec treaty.

Mrs. Forrest had made a successful début at New York, and an attempt to hiss her down failed.

A fire had occurred in New York, by which 500,000 dollars' worth of property was destroyed.

From California a the accounts are to the 1st of January. The amount of gold dust brought by the latest accounts to New York was upwards of 3,000,000 dollars. The news from the mines is encouraging, the yield in the placer diggings being very abundant since the rain set in.

The survey of the railroad from San Francisco to San Jose has been completed. Its total cost is estimated at 1,560,320 dols. 17 cents; but it is feared that considerable time will elapse before the work can be commenced. No further steps have been taken with regard to the other railroads proposed in the state.

There has been of late a marked diminution of crime throughout California. In San Francisco the spirit of political party ran very high.

THE RIVER PLATE.

The intelligence from Monte Video, dated the 6th ult., which has been received this week, announces that the war between the forces of the Banda Oriental, under Urquiza, and of the state of Buenos Ayres, under the Dictator Rosas, had been re-commenced, Rosas being resolved to make a final desperate effort to recover the control over the provinces of the Argentine Republic, which Urquiza had wrested from him. A large Brazilian division, comprising about 4000, had joined Urquiza. The Parana, and shots were fired upon the steamer from the batteries of party, headed by Rosas' brother-in-law, returned to Buenos Ayres. The remainder of the Brazilian army was at Colonia, and, it was thought, would soon be called across the river to strike a decisive blow. The province of Santa Fé had pronounced in favour of Urquiza. The best of Rosas' officers were leaving him and joining Urquiza with their troops under them, so that Rosas was concentrating all his forces at Santos Lugones, with the intention of awaiting the arrival of the enemy.

INDIA.

Advices dated Bombay, the 7th ult., communicate the news of the pacific solution of the difficulties which had arisen between our Indian Government and that of the Burmese Empire, in consequence of unfair and oppressive treatment received by British merchants at the hands of the Burmese Governor of Rangoon. Commodore Lambert had been despatched to Rangoon with a strong naval force, to demand satisfaction from the Government of Ava; and on the 1st January the answer of his Imperial Majesty "of the Golden Foot" to the Governor-General's despatch was delivered to Commodore Lambert, together with a reply from the Ministers at Ava to the gallant officer's own address. This latter contained expressions of sorrow that any misunderstanding should have happened between the British and the Burmese through the misconduct of the Governor of Rangoon; stating that that functionary had been recalled to Ava, and that the two Deputy-Governors were to conduct the duties of government till a successor to the one now removed should be appointed. The Governor of Prome was to inquire into the charges preferred against the disgraced ruler, and indemnify all British subjects for injuries sustained at his hands, and to exert himself to re-establish friendly relations with us. The Prome Governor was expected to reach Rangoon by the 5th ult., when matters would most probably be settled satisfactorily.

The necessity for the appointment of a consular agent at Rangoon to protect the interests of the British residents at that town, was strongly urged on Commodore Lambert by the residents. All the British ships of war remained off Rangoon, for doubts would seem to have been entertained of the good faith of the Burmese Sovereign, owing to the anarchy with which all our demands had been acceded to. A Burmese force of no less than 100,000 soldiers had been mustered at Rangoon and its neighbourhood, ready to fight in case we had not agreed to a formidable armament; but the letter of the Sovereign put an end to all warlike preparations.

Movements of troops to Scinde and Northern India are noticed; but the object is not stated.

The Nizam has at last, it is said, effected the mortgage of his jewels, but no further instalment of his debt to the Indian Government has been paid off as yet. The petty chiefs in his dominions continue quarrelling with each other with impunity, and the whole territory is fast becoming a prey to social and political disorganisation.

The Governor-General was at Cawnpore on the 1st ult., on his way to Calcutta.

Lord Stanley, who is now travelling in India, reached Delhi on the 7th ult., and left on the 9th for the frontier.

Mr. W. Theobald, barrister, has been appointed Professor of Law in the Hindoo College at Calcutta; and Mr. M'Leod Wylie, First Judge of the Small Cause Court.

The firm of D. C. Mackay and Co. has failed: liabilities, £200,000; assets, £90,000.

CHINA.

From Hong-Kong, under date November 30th, we learn that on the night of the 28th of that month a fire took place there which consumed almost the whole of the Chinese quarter of the town, consisting of about 500 dwellings. The European quarter escaped in consequence of a night breeze springing up from the east, and the blowing up by the Engineers and Artillery of several houses to stop the flames from extending. The most melancholy result of the fire was an occurrence which caused the death of Colonel Tonkyns and Lieutenant Sugg, of the Royal Artillery, and wounded several of the pyrotechnists of the same corps, two of whom lie seriously hurt; Lieutenant Wilson, of the Royal Engineers, being also in a precarious state. The party were employed in blowing up a house. The gunpowder exploded sooner than was expected, and while they were inside the building. Colonel Tonkyns was taken up senseless, but expired four hours afterwards. Lieutenant Sugg's body was entirely consumed by fire; nothing but his sword was left. The Governor had ordered mat sheds to be erected, and food to be distributed among the unhappy. A large number of Chinese had lost their lives.

The Kwangsi rebellion continues, and the reports respecting it are, as hitherto, numerous and contradictory. The rich men of Canton have been called upon by Seu, the Viceroy, to subscribe large sums towards the expenses of the war.

The emigration of Chinese to California continues on a large scale.

AUSTRALIA.—THE GOLD FIELDS.

Accounts received vid India by the Overland Mail, to the beginning of November, state that throughout all the Australian colonies great excitement was created by the announcement of gold being discovered at Melbourne, Port Phillip (now called Victoria), in such abundance as to leave the Sydney "diggings" quite in the shade. A completer desertion had taken place, to the great injury of the sister colonies, which were duly being deserted by all classes of labourers, who were hurrying away to the new El Dorado of Bonanadis were on their way, and even from California large numbers were lured by the reputed wealth of the Victoria province. From all accounts the Melbourne diggings are inexhaustible, while the quantity of gold to each man exceeds greatly the quantities which rendered the mines at the end of October, and the average yield or earnings of each digger was from 1½ to 1½ oz. of gold per man per day. The towns of Melbourne and Geelong, at the last-mentioned date, were deserted by the male sex. Their only population consisted of females. Flocks, herds, workshops, and the fields were all deserted by men, who preferred the moderate luck of £20 to £100 per day at the diggings, to toiling for a whole week for as many shillings. Government escorts had been established to protect the treasure in its transit to town, the daily amount transported being from 2000 to 3000 ounces. On October 23rd, for instance, the arrival of gold under escort from the neighbourhood of Melbourne was 88 lb. 11 oz. 4 dwts., and 136 lb. 9 oz. 16 grs. from the Geelong and Ballarat diggings, or a total of 2708 oz. 4 dwts. 16 grs. The quantity will increase with the increase of diggers, and some idea may be formed of the rate at which this was going on, from the fact that on October 24 no less than 299 steerage passengers arrived in Melbourne by four different vessels from Van Diemen's Land. As an instance of individual success, it is mentioned that on October 23 the large amount of 93 lb weight, or 1116 oz., was exposed for sale in the rooms of Symons and Perry, Bourke-street (Melbourne). The person in whose possession it was, state I that a party of seven had obtained it at the Ballarat diggings in the space of fourteen days.

The latest intelligence from Melbourne is dated Nov. 5, and is chiefly taken up with details of individual fortune or loss in the gold search.

From Adelaide (South Australia), news to November 13 mentions the discovery of small pieces of gold taken from a piece of quartz found in a district on the Torrens, about nine miles from Adelaide. Gold in its pure granular form, and of superior quality, has long and frequently been found in the province, but hitherto in such limited quantities as not to be a sufficient incentive for a more vigorous search. A subscription is now on foot to be given to the first discoverer of a gold field in South Australia. At Adelaide, on Oct. 16, a jeweller bought a quantity of gold from one of the settlers; whence it came is a secret, but it is supposed to have been collected from the banks or sands of some of the neighbouring streams

On November 8 a hurricane swept over Adelaide, and caused considerable damage.

SPAIN.—BURNING OF THE BODY OF MERINO.

THE very summary infliction on Merino of the capital punishment so justly merited by the wretched man for his attempt on the life of Queen Isabella (as noticed last week), was immediately followed by a further penal act intended to fix the stamp of infamy and abhorrence upon the memory of the criminal.

On the evening of the day of execution (Saturday, the 7th inst.) Merino's body was burnt, and his ashes were scattered over the common burial-ground in conformity with the decree of M. Ventura Gonzales Romero, Minister of Grace and Justice, addressed to the Governor of Madrid on the subject. The decree is as follows:—

Considering that, whatever efficient measures the Government should adopt, it would be impossible to avoid the partial or total abstraction of the body of Martin Merino, either to an interest of speculation or under the pretext of studying its organic structure, whereas it is important to prevent the fact as shameful and immoral, and that humanity would derive no advantage from the second; and in order that no trace should remain of the horrible crime against the Royal person of her Majesty, in conjunction with the most Reverend Cardinal Archbishop of Toledo, the highest ecclesiastical authority, and agreeably to the decision of the Council of Ministers, I direct that, in your presence, in that of your secretary, of an ecclesiastic named for that purpose by the Cardinal, of the presiding Judge, and the Recorder of the Court who tried the case, the body of Merino shall be burnt in the presence of the hour you may appoint, and that his ashes be afterwards thrown into the burial ground reserved to the poor. Please forward to me a procès-verbal of the execution of the above.

To the Governor of the province.

The official report of the operation is to this effect:—

In the city of Madrid, and in its cemetery extra muros, out of the gate of Bilboa, at a quarter to five, in the afternoon of this day, 7th of February, 1852, in presence of the Governor of the province, his secretary Antonio Querol, M. Antonio Tiburcio Acevedo, Chaplain of his Excellency the Cardinal Archbishop of Toledo, delegated by his Eminence, M. Pedro Nolasco Antrolea, judge in the cause, and I, the undersigned Recorder, the body of Martin Merino was burned. The wood and necessary utensils had been prepared to that effect, and the operation took place to the left of the entrance of the said cemetery, close to the common burial-ground. The body of the said Martin Merino was placed in the flames, after having been stripped of the cloak which covered it; and when reduced to ashes, his ashes were scattered over the common burial-ground. At twenty minutes past seven o'clock the operation was completely terminated. The chaplain of the cemetery, M. José Losada, was likewise present. The above persons all signed the procès-verbal; namely, Melchor Ordonnez, Pedro N. Aurioles, Antonio Querola, Antonio Tiburcio Acevedo, José Losada.

Done in my presence,

(Signed) José Perez Martinez, Recorder.

The Governor of Madrid, during the same day, issued a proclamation to the inhabitants of the capital, expressive of pride and gratitude to the people for the unaffected and ardent demonstrations of loyalty and attachment to the Sovereign, which the attempt of the assassin had called forth from all classes.

With respect to the Queen's health, the latest accounts, dated the 19th, represent the convalescence of her Majesty as proceeding favourably. The moment the population was positively informed that her Majesty was entirely out of danger, the whole city was spontaneously illuminated.

The Senate met on the 10th to draw up the programme of the fête which it intended to offer to the Queen on the occasion of her providential escape from the dagger of the regicide. The municipality and the different corporations were also actively engaged in making preparations for the public rejoicings, which were to commence on Sunday, the 15th, when the Queen, should her recovery have been sufficiently assured to overcome the apprehensions of the physicians as to the dangerous consequences of the excitement which her enthusiastic reception in public might create, was to repair to the church of Atocha, to thank the Almighty for his marked protection. The deputies present in Madrid had resolved to accompany her Majesty on foot, and to surround her carriage, from the palace to the church. After the "Te Deum," they were to assemble under the peristyle of the Legislative Palace, to salute her Majesty on her return.

ALBACETE POIGNARD, WITH WHICH MERINO ATTEMPTED TO ASSASSINATE THE QUEEN OF SPAIN.

The fêtes and balls of the Carnival, which had been interrupted by the dreadful event, had been resumed. The French Ambassador opened his salons on the 10th, and the Austrian Minister on the following night.

The Duke of Victory had addressed to the Queen a letter, dated Logrono, the 8th instant, containing the most respectful profession of devotedness to her Royal person, and entreating her Majesty not to afflict herself on account of that crime, as, for one contemptible traitor who was found in Spain, there were 14,000,000 of loyal Spaniards sincerely devoted to their Sovereign.

General Narvaez had also addressed a letter to the Queen and her Majesty's mother, Queen Christina, expressive of his profound grief at the cowardly attack on her Majesty's life.

The Gazette is full of congratulatory addresses to the Queen. One of them is published in the French language, and signed by all the French residents in Madrid.

The Duke and Duchess of Montpensier have given a sum of 6000 reals (£60) to the Archbishop of Toledo, to be destributed to the poor on the occasion of the Queen's recovery.

THE BURNING OF THE BODY OF MERINO OUTSIDE THE GATE OF BILBOA, AT MADRID.

The Queen has addressed the following autograph letter to the President of the Council of Ministers:—

Prostrated before Divine Providence to thank it for its signal protection and infinite favours, my heart is moved at the demonstrations of affection and devotedness which I receive every instant from my subjects. Those demonstrations, however, might be centered in an object, intended to serve as a permanent symbol of the religious and charitable character of Spaniards. To that effect, it is my desire that the Government should take the initiative, and open a voluntary subscription the proceeds of which shall be applied to the construction of one or more hospitals, in commemoration of the birth of my most beloved daughter, and of my reappearance before my people, after the blessings recently conferred on me by the Almighty.

At the Palace, 11th February, 1852. (Signed) ISABELLA.

COSTUME OF THE FRENCH SENATORS AND COUNCILLORS OF STATE.

ONE of the chief acts of the French Executive, last week, was the issue of a decree for the regulation of the official costume of the Senators and Councillors of State, which our Artist has illustrated. The following are the details, which appeared in the early edition of our Journal of last week:—

SENATORS.—Coat of blue velvet, with standing collar and cuffs embroidered, fitting close to the waist, and ornamented with embroidery on the pocket-flaps. The embroidery is to be in gold, representing palm-trees interlaced with oaks; the palm-trees in cannetille mate with the back of the palm trees in bright embroidery, the oak leaves being worked en passé, with the lines of the leaves in bright embroidery; the whole of the coat to be edged round with embroidery, six centimetres wide at least. Council of State.—Light blue coat, with nine gilt buttons in front; waistcoat of white piqué, cut straight, with fine gilt buttons; trousers of white kerseymere, with gold band down the sides. The Vice-President, the President of Sections, and the Councillors of State are to wear gold embroidery, composed of oak leaves and olive leaves interlaced, on the collar, cuffs, the front of the coat and coat tails, the whole coat being edged with gold embroidery. The sword is to be a straight one, with gilt hilt. In undress, the Councillors of State and Masters of Requests are to wear coats embroidered on the collar and cuffs, but without the gold edging, white waistcoat, and black trousers, without gold band.

COUNCILLORS OF STATE. SENATORS.

FRENCH OFFICIAL COSTUME.

COMMENCEMENT OF THE QUEBEC AND RICHMOND RAILWAY.

THIS important work was commenced with due ceremony on the 7th of January, in presence of a great concourse of spectators. It had been expected for several days that Lord Elgin would have been present to turn the first sod of earth and discharge the first mine of rock. The crossing of the St. Lawrence, however, opposite Quebec is always a cold and disagreeable operation, and his Lordship did not undertake it. The morning, at any rate, was such as to deter most men from attempting it whose duty did not compel them to do so. A violent snow-storm had been raging all night, and continued with such violence during the morning that hopes of the ceremony taking place had been given up by the people on the Pointe Levi side. Soon after ten o'clock, however, the storm abated, and the weather clearing up, a brigade of canoes could be seen dashing off the batture of ice at Black's Cove, above Quebec, and proceeding at a rapid pace through the open water to the hard packed ice, which the tide was sweeping along the southern bourdage of the St. Lawrence, in the direction of Hadlow Cove, the projected terminus of the road.

CANOES CROSSING THE RIVER ST. LAWRENCE.

In due time they struggled through the fields of ice, the canoemen now paddling vigorously in the openings between them, and then dragging their canoes over the broken pieces, and leaping from one to another, as they sank beneath their weight, until they gained the solid batture on the Pointe Levi shore. Here a serious accident had nearly occurred, by the one end of the canoe being on the ice of the river floating rapidly away, while the other end was being drawn on the fixed ice of the batture. Several canoes of the brigade had arrived about the same moment, and a jam took place, one canoe interfering with the free action of the other, while the ice in motion kept crunching on, and threatened to crush the slender vessel to pieces against the solid wall of the batture, or at least to capsize all who were in it into the river. Happily the expert canoemen saw the danger, and by sudden exertion averted it. On reaching the batture, the flags, which with a prudent fear of their causing an upset, had been in the bottom of the canoe, were displayed in triumph, one at the bow and another at the stern. Carioles were in attendance on the ice to convey the party ashore, of which convenience some availed themselves; while others retained their places in the canoes, now formed in line, and were slid over the glassy surface, the conductor singing a boat song, and the men taking up the chorus.

The passage of the river being happily accomplished, a procession was formed, composed of carioles, which proceeded about two miles and a half above the terminus at Hadlow Cove to the cliff on the Domaine of the Seigniory of Lauzon, where the ceremony of the day was to be performed. The road on the beach was decorated at intervals with flags, and at Hadlow Cove and the Seigniory mills were erected triumphal arches of evergreens. At the Domaine, a wide road, on each side of which were evergreens planted in the snow, had been cast to a romantic peak, jutting on the river, a view of which for many miles, as well as of the city of Quebec on the opposite shore, it fully commanded. Here Mr. Bailey, the engineer, had appointed the first ground to be broken and the first mine to be sprung, and certainly no spot could be more picturesque. The assistant engineer, Mr. Cane, had festooned, with flags of all nations, stretching from tree to tree, the open space on the summit of the peak, and otherwise embellished the spot with evergreens; while Mr. Rigney, the contractor, had erected on the snow an extensive platform, on which the principal portion of the company found comfortable standing.

The Hon. R. E. Caron, the president of the railway company, then addressed the multitude, and concluded by introducing the Hon. Francis Hincks, who was received with cheers, and proceeded with shovel and wheelbarrow to raise the first turf, which was followed by the rock below being rent asunder by a blast of gunpowder.

The Hon. F. Hincks then addressed the company, pointing out the benefits to be derived by Canada from a system of railways, especially with respect to agriculture. "Important," said the hon. gentleman, "as are all the sections of our great trunk line, there is none at the present time to be compared in point of importance with the Quebec and Richmond. (Cheers.) At Montreal there is easy communication by railway, not only with the great commercial cities of the United States, and with the far west, but with all parts of Upper Canada. By the Ogdensburgh railroad all the sections of Upper Canada in the neighbourhood of Prescott can be reached. By the Rome and Cape Vincent railroad we are brought within reach of Kingston, while by the Albany and Buffalo we can reach Toronto and Hamilton. Between Montreal and Quebec during the winter season the means of communication are so bad, comparatively speaking, that not one person visits, when fifty would do so if they had the facilities afforded by a railway. (Cheers.) The passenger trade of such a railway would alone be of great importance; but it is difficult to estimate the amount of goods traffic on such a line." The hon. gentleman then adverted to the wise policy of the Government in encouraging works of this class; the promise of some of the members present testifying that they take a deep interest in the important section of the trunk line just commenced. The importance of the union of Lower and Upper Canadians in the enterprise was next urged; as was also the conduct of the Corporation of Quebec, in aiding to bring, by means of this railway, the present capital of the province within the reach of the people in all parts of Canada.

The ceremony on the ground being ended, the company returned to Hadlow Cove, where, in the offices of the railway company, about 150 guests partook of an excellent repast. A variety of toasts were drunk, after which the company broke up, delighted with the proceedings of the day, and all returned across the river in safety.

The hon. Chairman, Mr. Caron, in proposing her Majesty's health, observed that, "as in the course of a few years a passage would be made across the Atlantic in four or five days, in a few years, also, a rapid means of communication would be established from Halifax to Sandwich, of which the Quebec and Richmond road, which they had just assisted in commencing, would form an important link; he hoped, when that was the case, and all the people of Canada hoped, that they would have the unbounded pleasure of seeing their beloved Sovereign on these shores." (Tremendous cheering.)

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1852.

THE New Reform Bill does not find favour with any portion of the public. The more it is studied the less it is approved of. Since we last addressed our readers upon the subject, the bill has been printed; and the public has been enabled to examine the schedule of boroughs, the boundaries of which Lord John Russell proposes to extend into the counties in which they are situated, or which he proposes to amalgamate with other small boroughs or villages near or remote. The list is in every respect a curiosity. It contains the names of sixty-six boroughs, each of which contains less than five hundred voters, and is for that reason to be extended. But upon what principle of selection the noble author of the Reform Bill has acted, with reference to the villages, boroughs, hamlets, or parishes which he has proposed to tack on to these rotten boroughs—for rotten the majority of them are—will puzzle all the wisdom of the nation in and out of Parliament to determine. It would almost appear as if Lord John Russell, smitten with remorse for the destruction of the numerous unsavoury boroughlings, which in 1832, in the days of his hot youth, he consigned to the apparently bottomless gulf of schedule A, had fished a great number of them up again in his matured age, to make amends to the ancient Goddess of Corruption, the political Cloacina, for the injury he had done her. For a borough to have been disfranchised by Lord John Russell swemt years ago, seems a reason for its re-enfranchisement at the present time in the eyes of our reforming Prime Minister; and to be a small place decayed or decaying, seems another reason in the same eyes why a Parliamentary privileges should be accorded to it. By the new Reform Bill only two new towns of importance Birkenhead and Burnley—are to be enfranchised; but by the same measure, should it ever become law, which is more than doubtful, at least half a hundred small villages, the very names of which are scarcely known beyond the boundaries of the counties in which they are situated, are to be tainted with the rottenness of the peccant boroughs to which they are to be annexed, and bribery and corruption are to be provided with fresh material and with harder nerves. Scores of the proposed unions of boroughs are so absurd that we cannot suppose they will be persisted in. Tavistock, the family borough, and which gives a title to the heir of the Russells, is to be extended from Moreton Hampstead on one side to Saltash on the other, leaving Tavistock itself somewhere in the centre—the distance between the extreme points being nearly forty miles. We have often heard of electoral districts, but such an electoral district as this was never before imagined. But the pains taken with the county of Wilts, to make it still a borough and no county, is, perhaps, the most extraordinary portion of the whole scheme. Lavish indeed is the care which has been bestowed upon that favoured spot, swarming with petty and decaying towns; and for that reason apparently—for no other is hinted at even in Whig circles—it is to be made of importance in the councils of the nation. The West Riding of Yorkshire contains a population about six times as great as that of Wiltshire, is assessed upon a rental about three times as great, and contains at the present times as many inhabited houses; but while the West Riding returns but two members to Parliament, Wiltshire returns 18. Every one of these Wiltshire boroughs, the city of Salisbury excepted, is reconstituted or patched up by the new Bill, although strict justice, and an adherence to the principle which dictated the Reform Bill of 1832, would have swept about one half of them away. The bill was not very popular before the publication of this schedule, though people were willing to accept it as a change that was neither very good nor very bad. But as investigation of this remarkable list has converted undifference into opposition, and offended the friends of reform in Parliament, quite as much as it has offended those who object to any change whatever in a system that may possess anomalies, but that at all events has preserved the fabric of our liberties. The Government has scarcely professed a desire to carry the Bill as it stands; for, in accordance with a practice which we may perhaps be convenient to its members, but which is scarcely consistent with the responsibilities of the details has been thrown upon Parliament; and, as in the case of the Militia Bill, the Legislature is asked to knead and shape the crude materials into form, the Ministry accepting all amendments, and adhering to nothing but place. But the signs of a break up are palpable; and so many disgraces and disasters are all at once accumulating, that it would be sanguine even on the part of any of the numerous gentlemen descended from the great-great-grandmother of Lord John Russell, who form the members or expectants of the Administration, to expect that it can long hold together. The dilemma into which Lord Clarendon has contrived to lodge it is bad enough; the unprecedented language which Lord Grey has thought fit to employ to a gallant soldier, only prevented from achieving what was expected of him by the perverseness of Lord Grey himself, is perhaps still worse; while a bungling Reform Bill—satisfactory to none, and offensive to many—is perhaps the worst of all. It must be confessed, however, that the Whig Government has at last done something. It has given so many scrapes, that it has excited public curiosity to know how it will get out of them.

RUMOURED RESIGNATION OF THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—The Standard of Monday states that there was a confident rumour current on Saturday evening, that Lord Truro had received a letter from his colleagues that his resignation would be acceptable, but that a difficulty had arisen from the impossibility of finding a successor, Lord Cranworth refusing to accept the Seals. The alleged reason for calling upon Lord Truro to resign is, that his Lordship has exhibited a disposition to repudiate the most important part of a measure of law reform actually promised by his colleagues in the Royal Speech.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

FAMILY COLONISATION LOAN SOCIETY.—On Wednesday evening, a "public group meeting" of the emigrants about to leave England in the Mariner was held at the Royal British Institution, City-road, in order to promote the objects of this society. The meeting was a very crowded one, being composed chiefly of the operative classes, anxious to obtain information on the subject of emigration, which has at present so strong an attraction. In the body of the hall there were about 500 persons, many of whom came to bid farewell to the emigrants. The scene presented on this occasion was a very exciting one. The Earl of Shaftesbury was in the chair, and on the platform, besides several ladies were the Right Hon. Mr. Sidney Herbert, M.P., Robert Lowe, Esq., late member of the Legislative Council, Sydney; Mr. Silas Higgins, Mr. Vere Fessey, and other gentlemen. Mrs. Chisholm, already who has founded the society, and originated its plan of operations, was loudly greeted on her appearance on the platform. The Earl of Shaftesbury addressed the meeting at considerable length, dwelling with much force on the favourable contract presented by the society's plan of emigration to any other. Hitherto, when the emigrant was leaving his country, it was a most melancholy occasion, seeing that then the most painful family disunions took place; but under this system—the system introduced by Mrs. Chisholm, whole families were sent off together, and the father was not separated from his child, nor the brother from the sister. None of these scenes now took place, but parents and age, the blessing of God favouring the efforts of the good Mrs. Chisholm, would be conveyed out together. (Applause.) He had himself seen much a sight on board the Athenian. He had seen the tender infant of six weeks old, and the aged grandmother of 83 years, go out together. ("Hear, hear," and applause.) Several gentlemen, other resident in London, were taking a lively interest in the subject, and having addressed the meeting, resolutions were adopted in support of the society's proceedings. A vote of thanks was passed to Mrs. Chisholm and the members of the committee, which was seconded by Mr. Sidney Herbert, M.P., and which were also voted to the chairman, and the meeting separated, giving three cheers for Mrs. Chisholm and success to the society.

LONDON ORPHAN ASYLUM.—On Wednesday the thirty-seventh annual dinner of the above valuable and important charity took place at the London Tavern, when about 120 gentlemen sat down to dinner. The chair was taken by Thomas Hankey, Esq., supported by several of the most influential members of the Stock Exchange and the banking interest. At the conclusion of the evening the pupils of the charity 277 boys and 120 girls—were paraded round the room, headed by Mr. Gobb, a gentleman who has taken a warm interest in its success, and their cleanly and healthy appearance was the theme of general commendation. One guest, who had been formerly a pupil in the school, came prepared with a plentiful supply of turpentine pieces, which he liberally contributed to the children as they passed. The chairman, in proposing the success of the London Orphan Asylum, stated that the institution was prospering beyond all anticipation. Dr. Croly gave the health of the chairman, alluding to the fact that Thomas has insinuated in the Bank of England had been induced to subscribe 100 guineas to the charity. The various lists of subscriptions were read, and the total of nearly £1900, including £160 from former pupils, having been announced amid hearty cheers, the company separated.

ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL.—On Wednesday the annual court of the governors of this hospital was held at the Gregorian and Vulture Tavern; H. F. Shaw Lefevre, Esq., in the chair. The reports of the general committee, auditors, and auditors were read and confirmed. The report stated that the nett proceeds of the annual festival, presided over by the Right Hon. the Speaker, were £2068 6s.; and that, under the advice of Mr. T. H. Wyatt, architect, contracts to the amount of £3462 3s. had been entered into for improving the drainage, for building a new chapel, and other additions. The number of patients deemed curable admitted to the hospital during the past year has been 1561. The percentage of recoveries during the past year has been [illegible] on the authority of the physicians, higher than in any previous year. The report of the chairman, as treasurer, stated that legacies had been received [illegible] and the expenditure £6846 3s. 3d., leaving a balance of £155 14s. 9d. in favour of the institution. Lord Overstone, president, the six vice-presidents, and other officers of the corporation were re-elected. The proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.—The usual half-yearly meeting of this society was held on Wednesday, at the London Tavern; Mr. W. Ramsay Hetherington in the chair. The report stated that the society had been steady and satisfactory, and that the surplus and the additions to the policies were gradually increasing. The policies remaining in force on the last of January, 1852, were 1867; annual £50,447, and the new assurances and renewals come from premiums of £29,008 8s 9d. The total assets on the 31st of December, 1851, are stated to £504,908 13s 8d., including the value of future premiums (£200,000), and the total liabilities to £314,193 2s 6d., leaving the present value of all the sums assured; leaving a clear surplus for division of £90,972. During the past year 70 new agents has been appointed. The report was adopted.

BRITISH COLONIAL BANK AND LOAN COMPANY.—The annual meeting of this company was held on Wednesday, at the offices, 80, Coleman-street, City, Mr. James Stewart in the chair. The report stated that the recent discovery of gold in the Australasian colonies had undoubtedly increased the value and importance, and benefited the property of this company. During the past year the directors had paid off the whole of the remaining debentures due by the company, amounting to £4,000, so that the assets of the company were now entirely relieved from all outstanding liability. The directors recommended a dividend of 2½ per cent. The report was adopted, and a resolution passed to the effect that the directors should take whatever course they might think fit, towards explaining the value of the shares of the British and the colonial shareholders. After a vote of thanks to the chairman, the meeting separated.

HOSPITAL FOR DISEASES OF THE CHEST AT BROMPTON.—On Tuesday, at a meeting of the board of management—Mr Thomas Lowndes in the chair—it was announced that his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury had, for this second time, consented to advocate the interests of the charity, as his Grace did in 1848. On Sunday next a sermon will be preached in the parish church of St. Mary, by his Grace, with a view to an immediate collection at the doors on the following Sunday at the approaches. The Duke of Cambridge has expressed his intention of presiding at the forthcoming anniversary festival for the same benevolent object.

LONDON FEVER HOSPITAL.—On Friday week the annual meeting of the governors and subscribers of this institution was held at the Freemasons' Tavern, St James's-street; the Earl of Devon presiding. The report stated that during the past year 877 patients had been admitted into the hospital, 740 of whom had been discharged cured, and 83 had died 103 remaining under treatment. Fever had prevailed most extensively in the months of July and August, during which 277 patients had been admitted into the hospital, or to more than 8 per cent. A large number of patients had been received from the neighbourhood of Gray's Inn-lane, the majority of whom were [illegible]. As many as 20 patients had been received from a single house, and in those houses it had been ascertained that as many as 27 persons dwelt to [illegible] rooms. The progress of the establishment, which in former years had taken the form of [illegible] had enjoyed a permanency in the new hospital. The total income of the hospital for the last year was £1600 0s. 8d., and the expenditure £[illegible] 4s., being £600 3s. 6d. over the receipts. The report was adopted, and a vote of thanks to the noble chairman ended the proceedings.

LONDON NECROPOLIS AND NATIONAL MAUSOLEUM.—A measure under the above title is now before the House, to incorporate and enable a company to establish a national cemetery, with avenues, catacombs, and columbaria, at Woking, in the parish of Pyrford, in Surrey, between the South-Western railway for interment in land to be purchased for the purpose of the Earl of Ons ow. It is proposed to contract with the London and South-Western Railway Company to provide a proper and convenient carriage, and for the conveyance and return of mourners and attendants, on the following terms:—For the use and haulage of the hearse carriage, without regard to the number of corpses in it £1; and for the conveyance of actual mourners and attendants to and from the cemetery—first class, each person, 6s.; second class, 3s 6d.; third class, 2s. It is also proposed to convert the railway arches at Waterloo station into depôt and reception places for hearses, carriages, and horses.

EASTERN STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.—The first annual meeting of this company was held on Wednesday, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street. The chair was taken by R. W. Crawford, Esq., who, in moving the adoption of the report, presented to the shareholders a most favourable account. The company was entitled to great credit as the pioneers in this eastern communication. The Eastern Navigation Company had sufficient funds at present; and should the question of the necessity for a call for more money arise, the contract with the Government should be obtained. Even then the call would not be more than £2 10s. per share every three months for the building of the ships that would be in such case necessary. The report was adopted, and the Board of Directors was elected unanimously.

AGED POOR SOCIETY.—The anniversary festival of this society, established more than 130 years ago, to afford relief, by yearly allowances, to the aged Roman Catholic poor of the metropolis, was held at the Albion Tavern, Aldersgate-street, on Tuesday. There were about 120 gentlemen present, several of whom were members of the Established Church, principally persons of Mr. Sheriff Swift, the chairman of the evening, who was supported by the Right Rev. Dr. Grant, the Right Rev. Dr. Morris, the Right Rev. Dr. Griffiths, Mr. P. Howard, Mr. Under-Secretary Hopwood, Mr. Hackworth, the Cafe, &c. The first toast given was the health of her Majesty, which was followed by his Holiness Pope Pius IX. Several other toasts having been drunk, subscriptions to the amount of about £200 were handed in, including Cardinal Wiseman, £30; Baron Rothschild, M.P., £10 10s.; the Chairman, £10 10s.; the Lord Mayor, £5 5s.; Mr. Alderman Wire, £5 5s.; a friend of the sheriffs (understood to be Mr. Alderman Salomons, M.P.), £5 5s., &c.

ARCHITECTURAL EXHIBITION.—The promoters of this exhibition, at the Portland Gallery, Regent-street, gave a conversazione on Wednesday evening, which was attended by a highly respectable and fashionable company of ladies and gentlemen. Earl De Grey, president of the Royal Institute of British Architects, in the course of the evening was called upon to occupy a temporary chair of state which had been erected in the principal room, and, after an appropriate and encouraging address, called upon Professor Donaldson to read the report. Mr. Godwin afterwards, in a very clever speech, proposed a vote of thanks to his Lordship, which was carried by acclamation. The proceedings shortly afterwards terminated.

THE LADIES' GUILD.—On Tuesday evening Viscount Goderich presided over a lecture delivered before a highly fashionable and overflowing audience at this institution, 4 Russell-square, by Mr Wood, one of the managers. The lecturer having explained the leading features of the Guild, stated it was the intention of the society to establish a home conducted on self-supporting principles, for ladies coming up from the country and desirous of availing themselves of the advantages of the society. A vote of thanks having been passed to the noble chairman, and another to the lecturer, the company separated, about half-past ten.

THE FATE OF THE EXHIBITION BUILDING.—The commission appointed by the Treasury to inquire and report on the proposed purchase and removal of the Crystal Palace have concluded their most patient labours. They have taken the evidence of Sir Charles Fox, Sir Joseph Paxton, Mr. Dilke, Mr. Cole, Mr. Hawkins, of the British Museum; Mr. Reid, and others; and the various suggestions for the future use of the building were fully considered; among these, were the project for a winter garden—a gallery in aid or relief of the British Museum—and an industrial and educational institute, to combine the leading scientific societies of London, the School of Design, &c. The question of site and cost were necessarily carefully considered. It appears that there is a project for removing the transept, with a certain portion of the nave east and west, and re-erecting it in Kew Gardens; but there does not appear that the commissioners have yet agreed upon any report. The ultimate decision (subject to the sanction of Parliament) will rest with the Lords of the Treasury.

ST. MARK'S CHURCH BILL.—On Saturday last a very numerously attended meeting of the representative vestry was held at the Court-house, Marylebone, for the purpose of considering and adopting measures in reference to the above bill, Alfred Dashwood, Esq., in the chair. Amongst the gentlemen present we observed Lord Sydney Stuart and Sir Benjamin Hall, Bart., the members for the borough; Mr. Flowden, M.P., Mr. Slowatt, M.P., Sir Peter Laurie, &c. Mr. W. E. Greenwell, the vestry clerk, read the report of the committee appointed as to the bill about to be brought into Parliament for the imposition of a double church-rate in the district of St. Mark's, St. John's-wood. It recommended that petitions to both Houses of Parliament from the vestry against the bill be also forthwith prepared, which the committee understood would, with the assistance of the members for the borough, prove of great benefit in thwarting a scheme which they considered of a highly objectionable character. The report was adopted after some observations from Sir B. Hall condemnatory of the practice, which he described was becoming too prevalent in the Church, for a clergyman to waggle himself into a living by coming forward and [illegible] a new church was about to be built and a district formed. It will require the so many thousands of pounds. If these proceedings were to be submitted to, they might have any more stick who could command £3000 or £4000 collected into an incumbency.

NEW METROPOLITAN CATTLE MARKET.—On Tuesday a meeting was held at the Three Pigeons Inn, Brentford, by adjournment from the Town Hall, to take steps for the obtaining the adoption of Brentford as the site of the great cattle market to be established in lieu of Smithfield. A memorial to the market committee of the city of London was adopted, after various speakers had addressed the meeting in favour of the scheme.

ST. PANCRAS WORKHOUSE.—DISMISSAL OF THE MASTER.—On Wednesday, at a fully attended vestry meeting of the parish of St. Pancras, held in the vestry hall, King's-road, Camden-town, Dr. Geary moved the following resolution:—"That it appearing from the minutes of the Board of Directors that Mr. Eaton, master of the St. Pancras workhouse, has forfeited their confidence, and that they recommend the vestry to declare the situation of master under the vestry resolves that the services of Mr. Eaton be dispensed with on and after the 25th of March next." The charge against the master was the default by the latter of the fact of having carried on a correspondence with Mr. Hall, one of the Poor-law inspectors. A long discussion having ensued, the resolution was ultimately carried by a majority of 50 to 4. The master was then called in, and informed, that, after the 25th of March, his services would be dispensed with.

On Wednesday night, about ten o'clock, a fire broke out on the extensive premises of Mr. Henry John Stewart, the St. James's Hotel, Jermyn-street. The flames originated in the kitchen, through the overheating of the oven. The floors were extensively burned, and the valuable furniture seriously injured. The building and its contents were insured.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—The births in London for the week ending Saturday, the 14th, were 1693; deaths, 1084; showing a surplus of 609. The deaths during the same week were 970, showing a great increase in mortality the first few weeks of the year. The mortality from diseases of the respiratory organs exhibited a slight increase on that of the previous week, but still considerably below the average. In the tubercular class the deaths from phthisis or consumption were, in the former week, 147, and in the last only 122. The total number of cases ascribed to zymotic or epidemic diseases was in the former week 201; in the last, 191.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—At the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, the mean daily reading of the barometer was above 30 in. on Saturday; the mean for the week was 29·940 in. The mean daily temperature was 40·6 deg. above the average of the same day in ten years on Sunday; on Monday the excess was only 1·7 deg.; and on the remaining five days the daily mean was below the average. On Saturday the mean temperature was 49·4 deg.; on Monday it fell to 40·6 deg.; and it continued to fall till Thursday, when it was 34·8 deg.; on the two following days it slightly increased. The mean of the week was 38 deg., which is near the average. The wind blew from S.W. on the first two days, on the next from N., and towards the end of the week from S.S.E.

GRAND BALL GIVEN BY THE KANDIAN CHIEFS TO HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR.

An entertainment of a very picturesque character has just been given in Kandy, the capital of Ceylon, to his Excellency Sir George W Anderson, C.B., the Governor of this beautiful island. The details, which are highly characteristic of the taste of the Ceylonese in these matters, we abridge from the Ceylon Times.

The Chiefs, with Dunuwille Dissawe at their head, fixed their entertainment for Wednesday, the 10th of December, to take place at the Kandy Library; the accommodations of which were much increased by the following additional verandahs and rooms, whilst a covered way led across the road to the Hall of Audience, where the splendid supper was laid out.

The decorations of the Library buildings were strictly Kandian. The whole of the front was festooned with oblas, and hung with variously coloured lamps; whilst in the centre of the enclosure formed for the reception of the Governor was a brilliant representation of a tree of light, each bud and blossom of which was represented by a lighted lamp, shaped to represent a flower. The interior decorations of the dancing-rooms were formed of beautiful muses, arranged in various patterns on the walls and ceilings, and combined with trophies and insignia of Kandian rank. Interspersed with these, upon the walls, were emblems of loyalty, with the words "God save the Queen," and "Welcome to Sir George and Lady Anderson," whilst from the ceilings were suspended several lamps. The programmes of the dances printed on white satin, were hung in the rooms. Of these national and characteristic preparations our description would be incomplete without noticing the robes of the Chiefs, each in similar but varying costume, according, we presume, to rank, and representing a different class of Kandian dress. Their appearance gave a singularly interesting feature to the whole, blending with the uniforms of military officers, the plain coats of private gentlemen, and the elegant dresses of the ladies.

About half-past nine o'clock his Excellency Sir George Anderson arrived, accompanied by Lady Anderson and suite, and was received by Major-General Smelt and staff, with the principal Chiefs. A guard of honour formed of a company of H.M. 37th Regiment, commanded by Captain Wilkinson, with regimental colours and band, added to the brilliancy of the scene, upon which scene the numerous lamps and the clear light of a beautiful moon. As his Excellency alighted a salute was fired on the Bund by a detachment of the Royal Artillery, commanded by Captain Hall. His Excellency having received the numerous greetings of the guests, a quadrille was quickly formed, and dancing proceeded with spirit until the announcement of a display of fireworks on the Green.

Supper was announced about half-past twelve. The repast was laid out in the Hall of Audience, whose ancient walls were decorated with graceful festoons of cloth. The supper was entirely English in its arrangement, and did credit to the hospitality of the Chiefs, and the indefatigable exertions of Mrs. Stainton, of the Kandy Hotel. Mr. Hart assisted in decorating the table, and, in the capacity of artist, is we understand about sending a drawing of the scene to the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

Though our friends the Chiefs had not led the sprightly dance, they undertook the duties of entertainers at the supper-table with spirit. In the most loyal speech, which was received with unanimous approbation. In the course of his spirited address the speaker observed:—

The present is the second occasion within the last thirty-six years in which the Chiefs of these provinces have come forward in a body to acknowledge the good news of not only the Government, but to mark their sense of the personal good qualities of the Chief into whose hands are entrusted the reins of that Government. For although the administration of his Excellency has been comparatively short, we have seen enough to convince us that he has the welfare of the Kandian nation at heart. We have discerned in him a disposition to elevate the Kandian character, and make us as little sensible of the loss of our native government as the circumstances of the case would warrant.

We also wish, ladies and gentlemen, to afford her Majesty some proof that the Kandian subjects, though behind their Singalese brethren of the maritime provinces in the march of civilisation, are yet as capable of appreciating the kind consideration evinced by her Majesty towards them by the selection of so tried and experienced a Governor as Sir George Anderson, a Governor whom our neighbours at the Mauritius could ill afford to lose. We beg therefore to assure his Excellency that the idea of the present entertainment has quite originated with ourselves, that it is wholly and entirely an act of spontaneity on the part of the Chiefs, some of whom are not even officially connected with the Government.

His Excellency then rose and addressed the Chiefs, by whom and the other guests his remarks were much applauded.

Degana Junior Basnaike Nilleme then rose, and, with some amusing allusions to victory and prosperity, proposed "The Army and Navy."

Major-General Smelt returned thanks for this toast, concluding by proposing the health of their hospitable entertainers the Kandian Chiefs.

For this toast, which was drunk with enthusiasm, James Dunuwille Esq., briefly returned thanks.

Cada Banda Ratamahatmaya of Hewehette then rose, and courteously proposed the health of Lady Anderson and the Ladies.

His Excellency and Colonel Hawkshaw, R.E., returned thanks.

The supper having been concluded, his Excellency and Lady Anderson, with General and Mrs. Smelt, retired. Dancing was then resumed, and quadrilles, polkas, and waltzes followed each other in quick succession, and did not finally cease before the morning gun gave signal of the approach of another day.

Great praise is due to the Chiefs, and to all concerned in getting up the entertainment, for their admirable arrangements; and it is only due to the hospitable entertainers to say, that they had the will, but wanted the necessary reception rooms, to have invited every European in Kandian country. As it was, every official both in Kandy and elsewhere, besides nearly every married gentleman and his family in the Central Province and in Colombo, were invited.

The accompanying Illustration, from the sketch by Mr. Hart, already referred to by our Kandian contemporary, shows the characteristic exterior decorations for this very interesting fête.

THE ABERDEEN CLIPPER-BUILT BARQUE "PHŒNICIAN."

This fine vessel has just made the quickest passage from Sydney on record, bringing with her upwards of £80,000 of Australian gold. The Phœnician left the colony on the 12th of November, and arrived off Plymouth on the 3d instant, thus making the passage in 83 days. Her length of cut keel is 122 feet; rake of stem, 26 feet; rake on sternpost 7 feet; extreme breadth, 27 feet 5 inches; depth of hold, 19 feet 1 inch Sailing and carrying powers were never more happily combined than in this vessel, which has discharged 780 tons of dead weight, and invariably made such passages as have not been surpassed either by British or American-going ships. The Sydney Herald of the 11th November in reference to the 'Phœnician says—"This vessel will again leave this port to-morrow, for London. She sailed for London on the 9th of Jan last, since which she has discharged and taken in two cargoes, being within ten months; and for the last three years she has made the run home under 100 days. She will probably arrive in England about the 26th February, thus accomplishing the passage out and home, including detention of loading and discharging, in the short space of eight months and a half." The anticipations of the Sydney journalists have been more than realised, as the Phœnician has completed the voyage out and home to New South Wales in little more than seven months and a half.

The Phœnician is one of Marshall and Knidge's line of Sydney packets, and was built at Aberdeen, by Messrs. Walter Hood and Co. An Aberdeen correspondent of the Times supplies a statement of the previous voyages of the Phœnician, as also those of the John Bunyan (also built by Messrs. Hall and Co.), which carries the palm in the London and China trade; and expresses a hope that when the facts are duly considered, it will no longer be contended that the American clippers have any just claim to be considered the fastest sailers, or as worthy of a preference over British ships like the Phœnician, and others of the same build. The following are the lengths of passages made by the Phœnician in the London and Sydney trade:—London to Sydney in 1849, 90 days; ditto in 1850, 96 days; ditto in 1851, 90 days. Sydney to London in 1850, 88 days; ditto in 1851, 103 days; ditto in 1852, 83 days; her last voyage being completed out and home in little more than seven months and a half. The John Bunyan's passages from China have been as follows:—Shanghai to London in 1849, 109 days; ditto in 1850, 99 days; ditto in 1851, 110 days; and her last passage from London to Shanghai was the quickest ever accomplished by any vessel, it having been done in 106 days against the contrary monsoon. Her outward passages from London to Anjeer in 1849 and 1851 were respectively 78 and 79 days. The Phœnician registers 526 tons old measure, and 473 tons new measure, and carries 750 tons of dead weight. The John Bunyan is burden per register 525 tons old, and 446 tons new measure, and she has invariably discharged 716 tons of tea; while the Oriental and other fast American clippers only carry a trifle over their register tonnage. Here, then, the British build realise the desideratum of combining fast sailing with large carrying powers, and this it is which gives them the strongest claims to preference. The owners of the Phœnician, we understand, have just launched another fine ship of the same build, but measuring 536 tons, being the largest ship yet built in Scotland: still larger vessels are in progress; and one has just been laid down by Messrs. Hall and Co., of Aberdeen.

SIR CHARLES BARRY, R.A.

The architect of the new Houses of Parliament, on whom, for the completion so far of his great work, her Majesty has been pleased to confer the honour of knighthood, was born on the 23d of May, 1795, in Bridge-street, Westminster; and it is worth mention as a curious coincidence, that his birthplace forms a part of the site of the intended outer court of the building. It may be that the Abbey so close at hand and seen so constantly gave rise to his early desire to become an architect. But from his childhood he displayed an eager taste for drawing and colouring. The walls of his room were covered with copies and designs in chalk and colour. At an early age he was sent to school in Leicestershire; and there also his pencil was the favourite occupation of his leisure hours. On his return to London he had made up his mind to be an architect, and, in accordance with his wish, was bound as an articled pupil to Messrs. Middleton and Bailey, of Lambeth, architects, but whose actual practice was mainly surveying and land valuing, and with whom he consequently had but little opportunity of learning his profession as a fine art. To this, above all things, he aspired. His most earnest wish was to study abroad—to learn not from mere measured drawings, but to gather ideas from the works themselves of all the masters of the art. He had not yet completed his time in Lambeth when his father died, leaving a numerous family, with but a slender inheritance. The subject of our memoir, so soon as the period of his articles expired, received his portion; and calculating that, with the larger part of it and so as to reserve just something for his return, he could spend eighteen months on the Continent, and with no encouragement, for family and friends on all hands warned him that he was setting out to throw away his means and waste his time, he left England in the June of 1817, being then twenty-two years of age, strong in the conviction, that, in the wide school of art before him, he should find his own way to fortune. He went not for amusement, but to work. His resolution was to make the most of every hour, and he set forth, not a mere hoping dreamer but resolved to invest his patrimony in the knowledge of an art for which he knew his aptness, and of his success in which he felt assured. He was not long in any anxiety as to his studies. In Italy the beauty and expressive power of his drawings attracted the attention of an English gentleman of fortune, who was about to visit Egypt, and offered the young student of architecture to bear him free of all expense as his companion, if he in return would afford him the benefit of his pencil. It was an opportunity of visiting a new field; the offer was accepted, and Mr. Barry was, we believe, amongst the first English architects by profession who travelled in Egypt. After a considerable stay, he went back to Rome, where his studio was soon crowded with persons anxious to obtain a sight of his drawings. He then travelled into Greece, and finally, having been absent for nearly three years and a half, returned to England. He was unknown, he had no patronage to look to, no introduction to set him on his way, but fortunately he was not long left without an opportunity of proving the use he had made of his self-adventured period of travel and study. The design for a church at Brighton was thrown open to competition; he was the successful competitor, and that church, so much admired, was his first architectural work that attracted public attention. For the Manchester Institution, a building in the Grecian style, he was also the successful candidate. The latter produced him many friends in Manchester, and he subsequently built in that neighbourhood the mansion of the late Sir Thos. Potter and the Manchester Athenæum. But most beautiful of all his works, and the one which at an early period of his career served more than any other to establish his fame, was the well-known Grammar School of King Edward VI., at Birmingham, and which he gained also in open competition. In London his first work was the Travellers' Club, followed by the building, in Lincoln's-inn-fields, of the College of Surgeons, so celebrated for its museum; and then the Reform Club.

In 1834 the old Houses of Parliament were burnt. The Government threw open to competition, by public advertisement, the design for a new building. Mr. Barry was one of the competitors. In 1836 the Commissioners made their report, adjudged his design the best, and the superintendence of the work was entrusted to him. Thus, within fifteen years of his return to England, he had justified his earliest conviction of his own powers. The greatest building of the time, a work to endure and transmit the name of its architect for ages, was in his hands—given him by no Royal favour, but won, as all his other important works had been, in the open field of competition

Much time was spent in forming the coffer-dam and the extraordinary foundations which the treacherous nature of the site required. At length, in the April of 1840, the building was begun, the first stone being laid at the north-east angle by the wife of the architect. Since then the work has steadily progressed, beset, however, with many difficulties, and to no small extent retarded through changes rendered necessary by the increasing business of Parliament and the need for accommodation in several departments different from that contemplated in the original plan But, in spite of all difficulties, the work has so far advanced that every public portion of the building may now be said to be open. It is true the entire west façade (as Abingdon-street is not yet erected, but two or three years will serve to complete it; and during that period it may be expected that the internal finishings of the other parts will be far advanced towards completion. Even then the towers will not have reached their utmost height, as it would, for practical reasons, be far from advisable to raise such enormous masses in so brief a time. To make their stability sure, they must be piled up slowly.

On the occasion of the State opening, on the 3d inst., of the Victoria Tower and Royal Gallery, and the first full and complete use by the members of the House of Commons of their new chamber, her Majesty was received at the entrance by Mr Barry, to whom she expressed her personal admiration of the magnificent building, and it was in connexion with this occasion that she was pleased to confer upon him the honour of knighthood. Other honours of an high order, in association with art, he had previously received. In 1833 he was elected an A.R.A., and in 1842 a Royal Academician; and he has also at various periods been elected a member of the Royal Academy of Belgium, Imperial Academy of Russia; Academy of St. Luke, Rome; Academy of Fine Arts, Prussia; and Academy of Fine Arts, Stockholm; and in 1849 he was appointed one of the Royal Commissioners of the Great Exhibition

Our list of his works is yet far from being complete. The new façade of the Board of Trade, Treasury, and Privy Council-office in Whitehall is his He laid out Trafalgar-square, and more recently has built Bridgewater House; and besides those already named, Highden Hall, the seat of Lord Carnarvon; Trentham Hall; additions to Harewood House, Yorkshire, the residence of Lord Harewood; Dunrobin Park, the seat of Lord Feversham; Dunrobin Castle, Rutlandshire, and Cheadley House, Maidenhead, seats of the Duke of Sutherland; Riddington, Oxfordshire, the seat of Mr. Ricardo; and Shrubland Hall, Ipswich, the residence of Sir William Fowler Middleton, Bart., where the alterations are still in progress; and Gawthorp Hall, Lancashire, the seat of Sir Thomas Kay Shuttleworth, are all works of his; and last, it merits mention, that the beautiful transept of the Crystal Palace was of his suggestion.

Our portrait is from a Daguerréotype by Claudet.

THE MUSEUM OF PRACTICAL GEOLOGY.

Though numerous endeavours have been made to communicate scientific instruction to a mass by way of lectures, they have generally failed from their desultory nature, arising from the attempt to embrace too many classes of society in Mechanics' Institutions. The varied tastes of mixed classes cannot be a change in the character of the instructions and an accompanious mixture of lectures on music, literature, art and science convinced the artisan that his amusement more than his advancement in knowledge was cared for. In addition to this cause of failure, it is well known that artisans do not willingly mix with those who, by being richer, are better dressed than themselves. To the directors and professors of the Government School of Mines have endeavoured to grant by the experience of the past; and, in illustrating a series of lectures illustrative of the collections of the Museum of Practical Geology, they have limited their audience strictly to working men and to the more talented students of the institute.

A register was opened, in which the occupation of each artisan who applied for a admission to the course of lectures was enrolled; the fee charged for registration for six lectures being 6d. The demand by working men for admission to the course has been far in excess than it was possible to grant from the limited size of the theatre; and the disappointment of those who were too late in their application has been so great, that the professors have advertised a repetition of the course. The subjects chosen for the first series of lectures were Geology," by Dr. L. Playfair; "The Reason why Fossils are collected and Exhibited," by Professor Forbes; "Photography and its Applications," by Professor Robert Hunt; "Explanation of Geological Maps," by Professor Ramsay; "The Occurrence of Metals in Nature," by Professor Smyth; and "Iron," by Dr. Percy.

The first of these lectures, that on Glass, by Dr. Lyon Playfair, was given on the evening of Monday week, and is illustrated by our Artist upon the pressed by the theatre was crowded by a most attentive audience; and we were much gratified to observe that many of the working men had brought with them pencils and paper, and were busily taking notes throughout the lecture, a thing showing that they rightly understood the object—to give them instruction, and not merely amusement.

We regret that our limits will not allow us to do more than glance at the leading points of Dr. Lyon Playfair's very interesting lecture, commencing with a few details of the history of glass; then passing to its chemistry, and next individualizing the various branches of glass manufactures, treating especially of each. Dr Playfair next, by the aid of numerous models of furnaces and tools, proceeded to explain the different manipulative stages in the glass manufacture, all of which could scarcely be explained without the aid of diagrams. The lecturer concluded by some appropriate remarks on the influence possessed by science in ameliorating the condition and elevating the social position of man. Without glass, the truths of Astronomy would have been almost hidden from our scrutiny; and chemistry as a science would not have existed.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

ROBBERY FROM THE LIBRARY OF THE BRITISH MUSEUM.—On Tuesday, Charles Pickering, a man of high respectable appearance, was convicted by Mr. Serjeant Adams, Assistant Judge, at the Middlesex Sessions, Clerkenwell Sessions, of having stolen 240 printed Plates, the property of the Right Hon. Lord John Russell and the other trustees of the British Museum. The prisoner pleaded guilty to the indictment. Mr. Wright Smith, a magistrate of this county of Sessex, stated that the prisoner had been tutor to his children for the last two or three years. He was a man of the greatest accomplishments, and he had every confidence in him. The Assistant Judge sentenced him to be imprisoned in the House of Correction and kept to hard labour for three calendar months.

On Monday, in the case of Bogue v. Houlston, an application was made to Vice-Chancellor Parker, on behalf of the plaintiff, the bookseller and publisher of Fleet street, for an injunction to restrain Messrs Thomas Houlston and John Sotheran, publishers, in Paternoster-row, from printing or publishing a book entitled "Story Books for Young People by Aunt Mary," the "Comical History and Tragical End of Reynard the Fox," or any other book or publication containing any article, print, or engraving in a certain book entitled "The Comical Creatures from Wirtemburg," including "Reynard the Fox," with twenty illustrations, drawn from the stuffed animals contributed by Hermann Plonquet, of Stuttgardt, in Wirtemburg, in the Great Exhibition, wherein copyright existed and belonged to the plaintiff. It was stated in support of the application that the learned editor of the story of "Reynard the Fox" was merely a translation from the German, which had been published nearly a century ago, as to the copyright was not claimed on that, but only in the drawings and the titles at the top of the pages, which, it was alleged, had been copied into the defendants' book, "The Story Book for Young People." The representations of those figures and groups, it was said, were merely colourably altered. The plaintiff had registered the book in pursuance of the provisions of the Copyright Act. For the defendants, it was contended that the objects in the Exhibition were intended for all and the defendants' prints were mere representations of those objects, with some accidental coincidences in the manner of dress, which did not materially increase the value. Mr Philp, the bookseller and publisher in Fleet street, for whom the defendants had published the work, had paid a considerable sum of money (£200) for articles shown at the Exhibition and copyrighted in a volume of prints. In question had been handed to him by the artist employed. The Vice-Chancellor said that the plaintiff would be entitled to the injunction if his legal right to the copyright could be established. He would, however, give judgment in a few days.

THE ENGINEERS' STRIKE.—The employers who have opened their shops at Manchester report that a fair proportion of hands have gone in on the new terms, and some have got their full complement of engineers and mechanics The police returns give only one establishment out of the whole sixty-six as closed entirely, and the number of operatives now at work, 2986 against 6564.

THE LATE POET LAUREATE.—It is proposed to raise by subscription a Land for a stained glass east window in Cockermouth Church, and a "Memorial" transept window in honour of the late W. Wordsworth, Esq., poet laureate, who was a native of Cockermouth, and received there the early portion of his education.

ACCURACY OF THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.—The Washington and New Orleans Telegraph Company were sued for 164 dollars damages, in consequence of their having substituted the words "sixty-six" for "fifty-six," in order for a transaction in cats. In summing up, the Judge dwelt upon the fact that telegraphic messages were liable to be perverted by derangement of the wires from atmospheric causes, for which the company could not be held answerable. he also pointed out that the message in question had consisted of a string of abbreviations which rendered it wholly impossible for the operator to understand it, or to form an idea on behalf of the company of the extent of responsibility attempted to be thrown upon him. Under those circumstances the value of the message was held to be inappreciable, but judgment was given for the plaintiff to the amount of 3 dols. 80 c. (the price of the message), together with the costs of the court

On Tuesday a number of new and well-appointed omnibuses commenced running between the Paddington terminus of the Great Western railway and the Great Northern station at King's-cross. The fare is 2d. for the entire distance.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

EAST INDIA COMPANY'S CHARTER.

In reply to the hint of Earl Ellenborough, the Marquis of Lansdowne said it was the intention of the Government to propose committees in both Houses of Parliament for the purpose of obtaining information previous to the termination of the interest of the East India Company in the revenue and territories of India. The noble Marquis also stated that an armament had been sent to Rangoon in order to demand redress from the King of Ava, for injuries inflicted upon British traders in his territory; and, in his opinion, all who were concerned in that expedition had satisfactorily performed their duty.

SHIP ACCOMMODATION FOR TROOPS.—THE "MEGLERA."

The Duke of Montrose called attention to the case of the steam-frigate Megæra, in which the troops intended for the Kaffir war were ordered to the Cape, severely reflecting on the officers of the department of the transport of the Admiralty, in having neglected to provide more room and better accommodation for the troops during their voyage.

The Earl of Minto defended the Admiralty, insisting that proper arrangements had been made for the comfort and convenience of the troops during the voyage.

After some observations from the Earl of Ellenborough, the Duke of North umberland, and Earl Grey in reply, the matter dropped.

The Bill for the abolition of the office of Secretary of Bankruptcy was read a third time and passed Adjourned.

THE EAST INDIA COMPANY'S CHARTER.

Mr F. Maule gave notice, that on Friday, the 27th instant he will move the appointment of a select committee on the affairs of the East India Company.

CALLING OUT A LOCAL MILITIA. THE GOVERNMENT SCHEME.

The House having resolved itself into a committee of the whole House on the Local Militia Acts,

Lord J. Russell said, that in 1848 he had made a proposition to Parliament that the local militia of the kingdom should be placed upon a more permanent footing; but, unfortunately, it was connected with a proposition for increased taxation, which was so unacceptable that the Government was compelled to give up the project. His now again brought forward the scheme, and he hoped the House would receive it with more favour. He did not make the proposition because our relations with foreign countries were such as to cause alarm, but a country like this should not be without means of defence in the event of any aggression on our colonies or on our own coasts; besides which, we should have a reserve for the army in time of war, or in case we could be called upon by any of our treaties to defend Portugal, or any country having similar claims upon us. Independent of these considerations, it was to be remembered that the changes in the navigation of the seas, by the introduction of steam, had tended to render us less invasion than we had hitherto been; and it was to be borne in mind that a militia force had always been deemed a wise and constitutional means of self-defence. With respect to the amount of naval and military force which it was proposed to keep up, he would leave it to his right hon. friend at the head of the Admiralty to state a the former when bringing forward the navy estimates; but with respect to the army he proposed that it should only be increased by 4000 men, and 1000 for the artillery service—a force less than had been already sent out to the Cape of Good Hope The proposal which he meant to submit to the House was the establishment of a local militia, the force of which should be not more than two-thirds by the lord-lieutenant of the county and one-third by the Crown. In the first year all persons between the ages of 20 and 23 would have to be balloted for, and it was estimated that 60,000 men. In subsequent years the ballot would be confined to those between 20 and 21, which would give 30,000 men. He proposed that one-fifth only should be balloted for, and that one-fourth of the number so balloted for should be required to make the force which might have valid excuses for not serving. It was also proposed that volunteers should be received, and that their term of service should be one year less than that of those balloted for four years, but that under certain circumstances they might be required to serve from six to twelve months longer He proposed that the militia should be called out for 28 days in the first year, and for 14 days in the second years, but it would be necessary that those days should be consecutive. The total expense would be about £500,000.

In answer to Mr. Reynolds, Lord J. Russell said he meant to bring in one bill for England and Wales; another bill would be required for Scotland in case of its being found necessary to extend the measure to that country. He did not mean to raise a local militia in Ireland.

Mr. Reynolds said he did not know whether the exemption of Ireland was intended as a boon or a compliment. (Laughter.) He could not certainly accept it as a compliment; and certainly if there were need of a local militia in England, there was still greater need in Ireland, where the coasts were more exposed to danger.

Sir J. Pakington asked in what manner the force was to be distributed throughout the counties of England?

Lord J. Russell replied, in counties They could not be taken out of their counties without Lord Lieutenant, except in case of invasion or immediate danger.

Mr. Hume condemned the whole scheme as unnecessary and expensive, and said he would divide the House upon it

Colonel Thompson thought the public opinion was in favour of placing the country in a proper state of defence.

After some remarks from Colonel Sibthorp,

Sir H. Verney was of opinion that the forces proposed to be established would not be found available; and if they were to have a force at all, it should be an efficient one

Mr M. O'Connell hoped the noble Lord won't reconsider his proposition as regarded the application of the measure to Ireland.

Mr. Cobden contended that we had ample means of defence if they were properly applied. He considered expenditure in the navy was largely beyond competition, for we had expended, since the close of the war, no less than two hundred and fifty millions of money on our navy. If they were really afraid of invasion, the Admiralty should recall the ships on foreign service; but without even doing that, there were ships at home quite sufficient to insure us against an invasion. He hopes the noble Lord won't not press the measure forward with the country should have time to pronounce an opinion upon it.

Lord Palmerston did not think there was any immediate danger of war; but as long ago as 846 he had, upon general principles, urged upon the noble Lord at the head of the Government the necessity of placing the country in a less defenceless position than that in which it had been for years. We had political interests beyond our own shores, which, besides our commercial interests, called for the maintenance of something like an armament The navy of that country he believed to be efficient; and if it were not, the sum which five or six thousand sailors were turning the drill for the whole militia of the kingdom.

Mr Newdegate supported the bill.

Mr. E. B. Hoche seemed to think that the bill to Ireland it would be equivalent to giving nothing to all foreign nations that Ireland was not to be trusted, and that it was the best place to land in

Lord J. Russell said a distinct bill would be applied to Ireland; but it did not follow that there was not to be a bill also for Ireland Indeed, if there should be a bill for Scotland, there would also be one for Ireland, for there was not the slightest foundation for the idea that Ireland was to be distrusted.

Captain Harris supported the bill.

Mr S. Herbert approved of establishing a militia force, but thought it would be better to resort to the regular militia.

Sir G. Grey said that a local militia was essentially a force for the purposes of defence; whereas the regular militia might be used for purposes of aggression To embody the latter, therefore, would be more likely to create jealousy in foreign countries than into existence a real militia.

After a few observations from Mr. E. Sayner

Mr. B. Osborne said that if a foreign army should land in Ireland, he would feel perfectly confident that the Irish police force would give a very excellent account of it.

A few some remarks from Mr. Trelawny and Mr. Alcock,

Mr. Hume said all this was the result of panic, and the present scheme was nothing less than a conscription against one class of persons—the class between 20 and 23. This was unfair; for, if such a force were necessary, they should have a fair ballot for all persons between the ages of 20 and 45.

After some further discussion, in which Captain Scobell and Mr. Anstey took part,

The resolution on which to found the bill was agreed to, and the House resumed.

SUITORS IN CHANCERY BILL.

This bill, the object of which was to abolish fees to certain officers of the court, and at the same time give a power to the Lord Chancellor to issue stamps from the Stamp-office to supply the place of those fees, was read a second time.

In reply to a question from Sir J. Graham, the Solicitor-General said it was not true that the Lord Chancellor had expressed great doubts as to the propriety of abolishing the Masters' office.

DISFRANCHISEMENT OF ST. ALBAN'S.

Sir G. Grey obtained leave to bring in a bill to disfranchise the borough of St. Alban's, after a smart discussion, in the course of which a couple of Kennerly in their expressed wishes to put an end to bribery was made by Lord Claud Hamilton against the Ministerial side of the House, which was met by Mr. Roebuck by a declaration of his own innocence of any such practices, and that his elections had not cost him one farthing. As to connecting him with Mr. Coppock and his transactions with the Reform Club, he could only say he was a member of the Reform Club, but he never went there.

In reply to questions from Mr. Whiteside and Mr. Spooner, Sir G. Grey said that he was not aware that offices under Government had been given to certain parties connected with St. Alban's, with a view to influence the elections; but if in the evidence such a fact was sworn to, he had no reason to doubt it, but he was wholly ignorant of the matter

Mr. Bell, in defending his own conduct, admitted that he had committed one great error in ever having gone down to St. Alban's at all. The hon. gentleman made some amusing reference to the proceedings prior to and during the close on, which drew repeated roars of laughter from the House. He could not deny the charges for the beverage, but he must say that the evidence taken clearly showed that nearly all the boroughs of England were in the same state, and it was, therefore, hard that St. Alban's should be disfranchised as a scapegoat for the rest.

Mr. Lefevre admitted the report of the Commissioners was perfectly just. He had, on his second election, determined that he would not allow bribery to be practised, but in spite of all his efforts he had no doubt it had taken place. A sum ten days after the election large bills were sent in to him, which he refused he was not liable to pay; but he thought it was in honour, and he accordingly did pay them at the same time declaring that he would never again be a candidate for St. Alban's.

Mr. Roebuck said, as the evidence showed that Mr. Coppock had intimated that he had the power of dispensing some of the patronage of the Crown at St. Alban's, he moved, as an amendment to the motion, that Sir G. Grey and the Attorney-General should bring in the bill, "but that Mr. Coppock be called to be examined at the bar of the House."

Lord G. Hamilton seconded the amendment.

Sir G. Grey deprecated such a course of proceeding, when no notice whatever had been given on the subject.

Mr. Roebuck said he would withdraw the motion if the right hon. gentleman would not oppose it when he should bring it forward.

Sir G. Grey complained that the hon. and learned gentleman was not treating him fairly.

Mr. Hatter said, that, as far as he knew, the Government had nothing to do with Mr. Coppock with respect to the election for St. Alban's.

Mr Thesiger quoted a passage from the report of the Sudbury case, which went to show that the practice complained of dated as far back as that period, and was, therefore, worthy of inquiry.

Mr. Roebuck then withdrew his amendment, and gave notice that he would renew it on the second reading of the bill.

On the motion of the Lord-Advocate, leave was given to bring in bills to alter and amend certain provisions in the laws relating to the summoner and execution of inside-letters and citations in Scotland, to amend the law of evidence in Scotland, and to abolish tests in the Scotch universities.

Mr Connolly obtained leave to bring in a bill to regulate the Irish fisheries.

On the motion of Mr. Bouverie leave was given to bring in the Annual Indemnity Bill, and it was subsequently introduced by the hon. member.

On the motion of Sir W. Jolliffe the following committees on preserved meats (fresh) was nominated: Sir W. Jolliffe, Sir F. Baring, Colonel Chatterton, Admiral Stewart, Admiral Bowles, Mr. Alderman Humphery, Lord C. Hamilton, Mr. Forster, Mr. W. Miles, Mr. Strutt, Viscount Newport, Mr. A. Hastie, Mr. Yorke, Mr. Bunbury, and Mr. Gwyn Adjourned at twenty-five minutes to twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

PEERS' OATHS—OBJECTION TO THE OATH OF SUPREMACY.

On the opening of the gallery, at five o'clock, their Lordships were found to be just concluding a discussion, arising out of the fact of Clancarty appearing at the table to be sworn, in conformity with an announcement which his Lordship had made by letter to the Lord Chancellor of his Lordship's intention to be sworn as a Peer of Parliament, notwithstanding his persevering in his objection to take the Oath of Supremacy, in which he is called on to swear that the Pope "hath no jurisdiction, power, or authority within this realm." This oath his Lordship declared he could not conscientiously take.

[As the discussion took place with closed doors, the papers are indebted for the following brief notice of it to a Peer who was present.]

The Earl of Clancarty appeared at the table, and stated that, in accordance with a communication he had made to the Lord Chancellor, he now presented himself to be sworn, but at the same time he must object to the oath as he had expressed at different times by petition to their Lordships' House to taking the oath of supremacy, yet, being desirous of resuming his place in the House, as he was entitled, as a descendant of the ancient peerage of the Catholic Church, conscientiously to take that oath, he was ready, if legally permitted to do so, to take the oath prescribed for persons professing the Roman Catholic religion, which he considered to be the correct one.

Lord Campbell, the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Brougham expressed their opinions that this proposal could not be entertained.

The Earl of Clancarty then referred to the standing order of the House, providing that no oath should be imposed by a bill or otherwise upon the Peers, with a penalty, in case of refusal, to lose their places and votes in Parliament, or liberty and estate, and he therefore claimed part legal and other obstacles which impede the investments and industry of the humbler classes.

Mr. LABOUCHERE did not think it would be advisable to encourage the humbler classes to make investments in speculative concerns, which generally carried with them a degree of insecurity commensurate with the benefits they were expected to produce. He could not agree to the motion of his hon. friend, but he would inform him that it was the intention of the Government to issue a commission to inquire into the laws of partnership, with a view to their improvement.

A long discussion ensued, in the course of which Mr COBDEN advocated the necessity of adopting a system of limited liability. Its effect would be to induce the parties possessing capital to diffuse it by becoming partners to a certain extent with those men of skill and industry, but who require capital to turn their skill and industry to account

Mr. T. BAINES expressed some fears that the establishment of a system of limited responsibility might give rise to the formation of great trading companies, which might have the effect of underselling and crushing the small tradesmen.

Mr. SLANEY ultimately withdrew his motion.

THE DUTY ON CARRIAGES.

SIR DE LACY EVANS moved for leave to bring in a bill for the reduction of the duty on carriages

The motion was opposed by the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER; and on a division was rejected by a majority of 35 - the numbers being 24 for, and 59 against.

STAMP DUTY ON RECEIPTS.

Mr. HEADLAM moved a resolution to the effect that it was the opinion of the House that the present stamp-impost on receipts should be abolished.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER opposed the motion; and on a division there appeared - For the motion, 28; against it, 61: majority, 33.

The motion was therefore lost.

MAIL CONTRACTS (AUSTRALIA).

Mr FRENCH moved for copies of the contract entered into with Mr. Walton for the carriage of the mails to Australia; and of the contract for the carriage of the mails to the West Indies and the Brazils, and of the tender made by the East India Company for the performance of these services. He found, upon inquiry, that the contract had not been completed by the Admiralty, having been rendered defective to Mr. Walton getting a company together. No security had been taken by the Admiralty. The recommendation of the committee of last session had been disregarded; for the Admiralty intended to run only a mail once every two months from India to Australia, instead of from the Cape, the more suitable route for emigrants. Other offers had been made to the Admiralty, by companies possessed of funds and vessels; but that made by Mr. Walton had been accepted, whose company was yet unformed, and who was very unlikely to complete his arrangements by the 3d of April, when the mail service was to begin. If the Admiralty entered into this, they should have ascertained whether there was a provision of coal; for he believed, if any vessels began the voyage on 3d April, they must stop at the Cape for want of coal. It would appear by the papers he moved for, that £200,000 a year of the public money had been unnecessarily spent on the West India steam-packet Company for the last twenty years. With regard to the West India and Brazil service, he understood that an offer had been made to perform for £90,000 a year that which now cost £250,000.

Mr COWPER thought that if the hon. gentleman knew more of the subject, he would not be so ready to condemn what he had. In the first place he had spoken of a conditional contract with Mr. Walton; but the fact was, the tender had been accepted some time ago, and the articles of agreement framed: but they had not been signed by the parties, therefore, was not legally executed: but when it was, the Admiralty would produce it. As to the statement that there was no company in existence, the fact was the company had applied for letters-patent to the Board of Trade, which was ready to grant it, and was at once provisionally registered, and they had bought two screw vessels of great speed. As to the offer to perform for £90,000 a year services which now cost £250,000, he (Mr Cowper) had never heard of it, and when the returns were granted it would be found to be a mistake. With regard to the contract for the Australian mails, the Admiralty had accepted the lowest tender, and given every facility for the execution of the contract.

The motion was then agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM BILL (IRELAND).

This bill was brought in, read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Friday, the 27th.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM (SCOTLAND) BILL.

This bill was brought in, read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Friday, the 27th.

THE LAW OF EVIDENCE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

This bill was brought in and read a first time, and
The House adjourned at 11 o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House sat from noon to half-past five o'clock.

The County Rates Bill, (the object of which is to consolidate all the laws on the subject and remove their defects) was read a second time, on the motion of Mr. FREWEN.

The Poor Law Bill (Scotland) Bill, the object of which is to restrict within certain limits the number of public-houses in Scotland, was read a second time, after a division on Mr. Hume's amendment - "that day six months," the numbers being - For the second reading, 123; against it 67: majority, 56.

The Bill for the enactment of Copyholds Bill was read a second time.

Mr. BRIGHT in the unavoidable absence of Mr. M. Gibson, moved the second reading of the County Rates and Expenditure Bill.

Sir J. GRAHAM said he objected to this measure had undergone no alteration whatever, still such several of its provisions were different from those of the former bill. The present bill on the Constitution of the County Boards took no account whatever of the map survey. The subject was one of such importance that it should be taken up by the Government; and, under these circumstances, he moved as an amendment that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr ROBERT PALMER charged the right hon gentleman with unfairness in making such matters changes in the bill.

Mr M Gibson defended himself from the charge of unfairness, contending that there was no alteration whatever in the principle of the bill; and that, as to the details, as he was the party bringing in the bill, he felt himself at liberty to make those changes in accordance with his own views, leaving the House to adopt or reject them, as it might think proper.

Sir G GREY admitted the right of this right hon friend to shape the bill as he pleased, but if he made material alterations in it from the provisions contained in the bill of last session, those who voted for that bill were not bound by it to vote, but must be at perfect liberty to judge as to what effect they would suppose the measure now before them according to its present aspect. In this opinion the alterations were extensive, and many of them so objectionable, that he could not support the second reading of the bill, believing that suffering it to go further could lead to no practical result.

Mr Bankes supported the bill.

After some observations from Mr Deedes, Mr. Hume, Mr. Henley, Mr. Barrow, and other hon. members

The House divided, and the numbers were—For the second reading, 63; against it, 130: majority, 67.

The bill was consequently lost.

The Copyright Amendment Bill was read a first time. - Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

EXPORT OF GUNPOWDER TO THE KAFFIRS.

The Earl of MALMESBURY said he had received a letter from Messrs. Wilson and Bushel, stating in reply to an assertion made in that House, that though they had exported gunpowder to the Cape of Good Hope, they were utterly ignorant of its ultimate destination and use. They expressed their horror at being supposed guilty of knowingly selling gunpowder to the enemies of the Queen. They declared that such was not the fact, and that they would take every precaution against any further supply passing from their hands to those of the Kaffirs.

PETITION OF MR JAMES HAMILTON STORY.

The Earl of EGLINTON presented a petition from this gentleman, praying for leave to introduce a bill to repeal a portion of the act passed in 1804 relating to the Mint and Exchequer Fees, and moved that the petition be referred to two English Judges, for the purpose of obtaining their report.

The petition, being seconded, was withdrawn.

INDIA.

The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH complained of the conduct of the Government in referring him to a comment on of that House for the information he had asked of a former night, in reference to certain transactions in India, when the Government themselves would have been pressed to afford it to him. He hoped that the noble Marquis at all events would produce the papers relative to his own recall.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE said he was quite willing to do so, but the most important of those papers had been carried away by the Earl of Ripon, under the idea that they were private.

The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH expressed his astonishment and indignation at this circumstance, declaring that these documents could not be considered anything else but public documents.

It was ultimately arranged that these papers should be produced if the committee required them.

The subject then dropped.

After some few formalities, the report upon the County Courts Extension Bill was agreed to.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

In answer to Mr T. Duncombe, Lord J. Russell said he was not then prepared to say what the intentions of the Government were in respect to the Crystal Palace.

COLONEL OUTRAM.

In reply to Lord Joselyn, Mr. FOX MAULE said that the India Board had received a despatch from Bombay concerning the dismissal of Colonel Outram, but the circumstances of such dismissal were not stated.

THE ST. ALBAN'S ELECTION WITNESSES.

The SERJEANT-AT-ARMS informed the House that he had been served with a notice of action in the Court of Exchequer, at the suit of William Lines, one of the witnesses in the St. Alban's election petition, and on the 27th with a notice of action, to which he was required to plead in four days.

On the motion of Lord J RUSSELL, the matter was ordered to be taken into consideration to-morrow (Friday).

THE LORD-LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND AND THE "WORLD" NEWSPAPER. VOTE OF WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

Lord NAAS, in a very crowded House, rose to move the following resolution - "That, in the opinion of this House, the transactions which appear recently to have taken place between the Irish Government and the editor of a Dublin newspaper are of a nature to weaken the authority of the Executive, and to reflect discredit on the administration of public affairs." The noble Lord entered at length into the details of the proceedings, which were given to the public at the recent trial of Birch v. Sir William Somerville, the chief Secretary for Ireland, for the recovery of large damages for libel. Birch to be due to him by Lord Clarendon and the Government of Ireland for services rendered by him, in the columns of his newspaper, to the cause of law and order, in 1848 and 1849, when public liberties were promulgated by several organs of the press in Ireland. The noble Lord stigmatised the conduct of the Government as degrading to the character of the executive of the country, in squandering the public money by hiring the services of a writer whose antecedents showed him to be a man of disreputable character, and he called upon the House to affix the seal of its condemnation and censure upon such conduct.

Lord J. RUSSELL defended the conduct of the Government from the imputations sought to be cast upon it by the noble Lord. The difficulties and dangers of the period were such as to render it necessary for the Government not to throw away any chance of defending law and order which were presented. The course taken by the noble Lord on the present occasion was certainly not very dignified or manly. It was as if a noble vessel, having been fitted out at the public expense, a Ranger of war, were moved by the skill and gallantry of the captain; and, when she was entering the harbour in safety, the owner who had taken no part in the struggle with difficulty crept out of the hold, where he had hid himself, and said, "Stop, I must investigate all bills. I must see what was the conduct of the captain and crew during the storm; and if I find one man of the crew not what I think he ought to be, I will disregard all I observed of the gallantry of the captain." The conduct of the noble Lord was something analogous to that of such a passenger, and he trusted the House would receive its sanction to such a course.

Mr. DISRAELI said that the speech of Lord J. Russell was ingenious sophistry, for it was as much as to say that rebellion was to be put down by whatever means were contestable, and then an appeal should be made to the country for a verdict of approval. Such a course could not be maintained, either on the ground of morality or good policy.

Mr. MOORE said the people of Ireland looked to their decision upon this question with the greatest anxiety. The noble Lord could only avoid the real question by asserting that this was a party motion. This (Mr. Moore) denied. It was a motion involving misconduct in the Queen's representatives which it was impossible to justify.

Mr. E. B. ROCHE opposed the motion, because if carried it would have the effect of turning out the Government and of placing a party in office that would only look over the Reform Bill, but would enforce the penalties under the Ecclesiastical Titles Act.

Col SIBTHORP supported the motion.

Mr. POWER spoke in opposition to it.

Mr NEWDEGATE could not refuse to condemn conduct which had been practically endorsed by the Government itself.

Colonel TAUNTON said, the question appeared to him to be, whether he would take part with a convicted libeller or his victim. He had no difficulty in siding with Lord Carendon.

Lord CLAUD HAMILTON said that though it appeared to him to be a high privilege to know Lord Carendon in private life, yet he felt bound to vote for the motion, which cast a censure upon one act only of his public career, which he was from any regard as a grave error.

Sir D. NORREIS justified the conduct of Lord Clarendon.

Lord PALMERSTON defended the conduct of Lord Carendon, who would have been much more to blame if in the critical circumstances in which the country was placed he had rejected the offer of the proprietor of the World newspaper.

Lord NAAS briefly replied; after which the House divided, when the numbers were—

THE TACTICS OF THE CONSERVATIVE PARTY ON THE REFORM BILL

The Morning Herald of Tuesday makes the following announcement on this subject:—

"A numerous meeting of members of the House of Commons took place yesterday (Monday), at the Earl of Derby's residence in St. James's square, when the course to be pursued by the Protectionist party on Lord John Russell's new Reform Bill was discussed. Lord Derby made a powerful speech, in which he stated, that, in the opinion, a most decided opposition should be made to the second reading of the bill, on the ground that the Reform Bill of 1832 had set had the preponderance of the aristocratic and democratic powers of the Constitution, and had at the time been accepted as a settlement of the question of reform in the House of Commons; and that, although he admitted there were many defects in that bill, which he was not answering should be amended, yet that the present measure would entirely upset the balance of these powers, and add greatly to the democratic party; that he was, therefore, decidedly adverse to the measure, and recommended that it should be opposed in the early stage possible. They might, perhaps, be beaten in the outset; but, at all events they would have done their duty to the Throne and the country. The noble Earl's observations were received with the greatest enthusiasm, and a resolution to oppose the second reading of the bill was carried with only one dissentient voice.

SIX vessels belonging to Commodore Martin's fleet, from the Tagus, came anchor in Queenstown harbour, Cork, on Monday afternoon, and others were expected to arrive in the course of the evening.

THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

(SECOND NOTICE)

WE resume our observations upon the works of living artists exhibited at the British Institution, keeping, in the first instance, to the landscapes and sea-pieces.

Of the latter class we have a very beautiful specimen in E. W. Cooke's "Scheveling Shore, low water" (No. 90). The air is bright and clear; a smart breeze is blowing off shore; the water, which is shallow, and stretches out into the view, is covered with ripples. On the sands are two Dutch craft, the details of which are most admirably elaborated. Indeed, every point in this little work is finished with a most delicate brush and great truthfulness of effect.

F Danby has "A Scene in the Vale of Tempe" (108), very agreeably realising the descriptions of the poets of that delicious retreat: glittering rocks, umbrageous foliage, and purling streams, with sunshine and shade ingeniously blent; all is touched off with a golden pencil, and yet not exaggerated in tone. A light mist hangs upon the air, which advantageously subdues the glowing hues of sunset. In various parts are groups of nymphs disporting themselves very rationally, and with whom we have no objection to make acquaintance, but the stray damsels bathing in the foreground might perhaps have been dispensed with.

T. Danby's "Lake of Thun, Switzerland" (No. 133), which we engrave, commands attention by its luminous warmth of colouring, which is of that magical kind that we almost feel the sultry heat of the summer's sun as we look at it. In the far distance are the Alps, towering aloft in golden splendour, and throwing their reflection upon the wide placid lake, whose level surface extending to the very recesses of the picture. The sear glances and sparkles under the effect of innumerable rays of light reflected from the whole surrounding district, and concentrated as it were upon one spot. The manner in which these bright touches are given suggests at the distance the idea of a very deep impasto, but upon nearer inspection they are found to be finely, but carefully, laid on. In front are two flat-bottomed boats, in one of which a man is asleep As we quit this work, admirably as it is executed, and gorgeous in effect, we still ask ourselves, in pursuance of the remarks with which we set out last week, whether it might not have been rendered more satisfactory both to the eye and the imagination by the introduction of a little shade in the foreground. In nature, the eye, when satisfied with hot and glittering rays, turns intuitively to the cool green and blue of the hill side and the shaded streams, and why not so in art also? The introduction of such elements so far from interfering with the splendid character of the picture, would but serve to restore the powers and rekindle the appetite of the spectator for its prevailing effects. The truth of nature would also be essentially consulted; nature, which delights in a system of compensations, by which an average balance usually is struck between the most opposite influences.

J. Linnell's "Loch Lomond" (No. 257) is another sunlit picture, successfully treated, but without that breadth and depth of glowing effects observable in the work of his kinsman just described.

J. Wilson, jun., has a sea piece of considerable merit (No 310), "An Early Lighthouse, Jetty, &c., on the coast of Normandy." A smart gale is coming on from the seaward, and a black cloud rising heavily from the same quarter portends a storm. The almost pitchy gloom of this portion of the picture is artfully enlivened by a very simple contrivance—a floating buoy, surmounted with a strip of scarlet cloth as a flag; and above that a seagull hovering, a little aloof from a whole flight of similar birds, whose line stretches into the distance. On the right is a rugged sea-broken shore, from which, undaunted by the raging of the elements, some fishing-boats are endeavouring to effect their departure, though we do not they will have to sail almost in the wind's eye.

We come now to what, upon the whole, we are tempted to pronounce the most agreeable landscape in the collection (No. 511), "A Summer Day," by A. W. Williams. The scene represented is a river-side view, in which we fancy we recognise some of the well-known features of Old Father Thames. The general character of the country is flat: the river creeping sluggishly along, amidst tangled boughs of trees, osier-beds, and sedgy weeds—almost buried in which are a few cows, truthfully painted. On the right of the picture the artist's pencil takes a wider range, closing in the background with a distant range of wooded hill, sober and undefined in tone; while above is the expanse of a bright summer sky, across which bright clouds are drifting. The tints of the foliage are varied, without patchiness; indeed, the general treatment as re-pects colour is rient and harmonious.

Hastings has two pieces of rustic life: No. 132, a "Bird-tender," a boy in a smockfrock, sitting on a stile, with a gun in his hand, looking out ripe for mischief; and 156, "Wanting a Shot —Wood Pigeons," another boy in a smockfrock, with gun, &c., just a counterpart of the former, but in a different attitude. Both these works exhibit considerable merit of intention, and have a taking air about them; but when you come to examine them, you find this artist's usual manner of handling indulged in almost to excess; colours broadly and coarsely, not to say carelessly laid on, and a certain air of affectation which one is apt to get tired of. In the latter work of the two the drawing is very imperfect; the boy's left leg is much too long, and his right hand and wrist attenuated almost to deformity.

In the genre style, we have first to mention F. Goodall's picture of the "Love-letter" (No. 4), one of those little scenes of life in which the artist's powers of story-telling as well as of painting are called into requisition, and in which Mr. Goodall has been generally very successful. In the present instance we are not so satisfied as usual with the story-telling part of the business. A young country lass has just received "a love-letter," which she is supposed to be "eagerly devouring," whilst the post-boy waters his pony at the tank before the door. On the other side of the picture is an elderly woman, who looks askance and inquiringly at the face of her daughter, as though she was not quite satisfied with "these goings on." In the foreground are some poultry, vegetables, &c.; and through an opening in the old-fashioned farm buildings a pretty bit of landscape is pleasingly introduced. In short, throughout there is a great deal of effort displayed, but it partially fails for want of unity and purpose. The expression of the girl is very deficient; and that bestowed upon the old woman more than problematical in its meaning. We need hardly say that the execution exhibits admirable workmanship a finesse of pencil in minute details rivalling the best masters of the Dutch schools. The colouring is generally satisfactory; all, indeed, except the cold green dress of the girl, which is not exactly to our taste, speaking pictorially, whilst the colour itself, implying "forsaken," is not suggestive of the spirit of "a love-letter" and its accustomed results, supposing the intentions of the writer to be "honourable."

E. A. Goodall has three pieces one of which (No. 20), "The Interior of a Cabaret in Brittany," is a little gem of miniature life painting. The figures are of the class conventionally allotted to such scenes -two rough-looking men discoursing over their pipes at a table, upon which is a pumpkin, whilst a female is about to hand the welcome glass of schnapps. Towards the background on the right is another female, sitting in a thoughtful mood. The expression of all the faces is genuine and lifelike, the details everywhere delicately perfectionated, and the general tone warm and harmonious. "The Interior of a Farrier's Shop" (No. 166), by the same artist, is a fair production, but by no means equal in merit to that we have been describing. The colouring is too glary, and the subject not so carefully studied.

"Wicked Eyes" (92), by W. F. Frith, is a charming little bit, in a circle a foot and a half in diameter. A fine, healthy, intelligent, and open-hearted girl, leaning back in a degagée manner, looks you right in the face, shading her eyes the while with one hand, the mouth entr'ouvert, and with a smile just threatening to "enter an appearance." But, after all, why "wicked eyes?" Those eyes are too open and honest, and challenge the blunt gaze of every comer too freely, and answer it too frankly, to come within the meaning of the term "wicked," as applied to eyes. Look at them again, gentle spectator; there is no deceit, no falsehood, no arrière pensée in their round joyous development; and when woman is not false nor deceitful, how shall she be wicked? We say this emphatically, despite of the rhyming philosophy of the author of "Irish Melodies," which in the case of the verse beginning

Some looks there are so holy,

&c., we must denounce as a libel upon humanity in general, and feminine humanity in particular. The colouring of this admirable sketch (for it is not much more) is deliciously in keeping with the sentiment—a pale pink prevailing in the easy-sitting morning dress, whilst a rich green velvet pillow sets off the fresh and delicate hues of the face and hand.

"The Happy Family" (1488), by Earl (which we engrave), is an extremely clever animal group, after an original well known in the streets of London. A monkey, cat, owl, pigeon, squirrel, guinea-pig, rabbits, &c., are introduced, and each characteristically rendered; the coats and feathers being admirably ressemblable, and the expressions spirited and truthful.

We shall pay another visit to this Exhibition.

LONDON TEMPERANCE LEAGUE: GREAT JUVENILE GATHERING OF BANDS OF HOPE, ETC., IN EXETER HALL, ON MONDAY.

MISS CRICHTON.

The new English prima donna has acquired the supremacy in one character. Before her début on the boards of Drury-lane Theatre, on the 23d ult., her name was utterly unknown to the general public. There was no theatrical radiance shining around her, no piquant biography to announce her approach. Managers had not disputed for her engagement, and she was not even able to plead a broken contract as a superlative mode of rushing into print and fame. The bills of "Robert le Diable" simply specified, "the Princess, Miss Crichton, pupil of Manuel Garcia—her first appearance on any stage;" and the amateur's inquiry as to "Who is Miss Crichton?" was only answered with the remark, "Oh, she is only a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music." And yet this pupil, this novice, without patronage, without distinction, brought forward without preliminary puffery, bids fair to be one of the brightest ornaments of the English lyric stage. Whatever anxiety may now exist to learn every detail regarding such a promising vocalist, we have little to supply in the way of exciting incident. Miss Crichton was born in London, and was not destined for the stage or concert-room. She is now twenty-one years of age, and is the daughter of a merchant of long-standing in the City, and is very highly connected on her mother's side. It was never intended she should become a public singer until the year 1847, which disastrous epoch in mercantile history caused so great a change in her father's circumstances, that she took, with filial feeling, the pious resolution to devote her natural musical talents for the benefit of her parents. She was, therefore, placed in the Royal Academy of Music, in which excellent institution she became the pupil of the celebrated Manuel Garcia, the brother of Malibran and Viardot, and the master of Jenny Lind. The lessee of Drury-lane Theatre, having heard Miss Crichton, felt so confident as to her abilities, that he did not hesitate to assign to her the difficult part of the Princess Isabella for her first appearance. This is no ordinary ordeal, according to the original opera; but, in the English adaptation, the difficulties attending the character have been rendered more onerous by the arrangement of the text. In Scribe's version the Princess enters in the second act, and has a recitative, "Que je hais la grandeur," followed by an andantino, "En vain j'espère," and wound up by an allegretto movement with chorus, "Idole de ma vie," replete with florid passages of the bravura school. Then in the fourth act the Princess has the impassioned cavatina, "Robert, toi que j'aime," one of the most powerful dramatic airs ever conceived by any composer. In the Drury-lane arrangement, these two grand scenas of the Princess are included in the third act, thus rendering the exertions of the singer doubly fatiguing. How triumphantly Miss Crichton has acquitted herself, has been duly recorded in the Illustrated London News. The compass of her voice is from D in alt to the lower G—nineteen notes of excellent quality—rich, round, and sympathetic, in every way calculated to depict varying dramatic emotion. She has now to get over the awkwardness arising from stage inexperience; and after twelve representations, it is evident that she has the intelligence and the will to improve her acting. In addition to a pure and full organ, her method is excellent and her execution is already extremely brilliant. She has been assigned the principal part in the forthcoming new opera by Balfe; and there is every prospect, by a continuation of study and application, of a brilliant future for Miss Crichton.

LONDON TEMPERANCE LEAGUE.

On Monday afternoon a most interesting meeting of the Bands of Hope connected with the London Temperance League was held in Exeter Hall. Mr. J. S. Buckingham presided on the occasion. At four o'clock various processions of the different schools thronged the Strand on their way to the Hall. A great many vans and omnibuses from Kentish Town and the outlying districts were in requisition for the occasion, and conveyed an immense number of children from those parts to the place of meeting. At about a quarter before five o'clock the vast Hall and platform was crowded with the juveniles; including adults, there could not have been less than 6500 persons present. The Bands of Hope Schools were present from Fitzroy, Marylebone, and Paddington; St. Pancras Teetotal, Juvenile Teetotal Society, Knox Chapel, Portman-market Sunday School; Dauntless, from Lisson-grove; Kensington Juvenile School, Kentish and Camden Town, &c.

The numerous banners and flags of different colours which were scattered around produced an exceedingly pretty effect, and added considerably to the general appearance of the Hall.

Mr. Buckingham on his arrival was received by a hearty burst of cheering from the children, which continued for several moments. Several of the ministers of the Established Church and of the Dissenters were present on the occasion.

Excellent speeches having been delivered, inculcating the advantages and blessings of temperance, both in a spiritual and wordly point of view an address was unanimously adopted for presentation to his Royal Highness Albert Edward Prince of Wales, from which the following is an extract:—

Your Royal Highness will be, doubtless, pleased to hear that our numbers are continually increasing. We thus hope to grow up sober, industrious, and happy; a comfort to our parents and friends, useful members of society, and loyal and devoted subjects of her most gracious Majesty Queen Victoria. We believe that the righteousness that exalteth a nation can never prevail while the desolating influences of strong drinks are felt.

It is our earnest hope that the life of your Royal Highness may long be spared and that the example of your Royal Highness may be a standing rebuke, not only to intemperance, but to every practice by which evil is inflicted on our beloved country. We pray, also, most earnestly, that divine Providence will be pleased to grant long life and prosperity to her most gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, to his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and to all the members of your Royal Highness' illustrious family.

Send Providence permit us to live to become the men and women of future years it will be among the most pleasing recollections of our youthful days that your Royal Highness has graciously received this our humble address, and thus encouraged us in the course on which we have entered.

The address was signed by the chairman on behalf of the meeting.

It was resolved that it be accompanied with a book entitled "Temperance Cyclopædia," by the Rev. W. Reid.

The book contained the following inscription:—"Presented to his Royal Highness Albert Edward Prince of Wales, by the Band of Hope, convened at Exeter Hall, London, the 16th day of February, 1852, by the committee of the London Temperance League."

The "National Anthem" was then sung by the vast audience with great effect.

It should be mentioned that these numerous schools of the Bands of Hope, comprising the children of rugged and other schools, are superintended wholly by the voluntary efforts of the teachers who instruct them, and to whom the highest credit is due.

In the lower room a second meeting took place for the same object, at which Mr J. Guest, of Rotherham, took the chair. It was addressed by Mr. Cole, of Greenwich; Mr. Passmore Edwards, and Mr. Heisell, one of the committee. The address was unanimous y agreed to.

The children from the suburbs were conveyed home in vans and omnibuses.

After an interval of an hour, during which the different schools departed, a meeting of the Adult Society was held, over which the Rev. C. H. Bateman presided.

The proceedings closed at a late hour.

THE THEATRES.

ST. JAME'S.—FRENCH PLAYS.

The season of French plays commenced on Monday, with "La Pension Alimentaire" and "Le Marquis de Lanrza," illustrated by the talents of Mdlle. Déjazet and M. Lafont. In the character of the spendthrift the latter assumed an easy, an abandonment, and a love of pleasure which lent even to scamphiness a grace, and resembled one to the chaumement of the piece, which gives to this maiseau réglé the ultimate triumph. Mdlle Déjazet was welcomed with peculiar fervour by the audience—an interval of years having clan-ed since her former appearance. What she was then she still continues—brilliant and charming, without the slightest abatement of vigour. Our readers know that the interest of the piece lies in Mdlle Déjazet's assumption of various characters. To puzzle the lawyers in a suit, the Marquis visits the Aube Council as a pedant; with other parties he is a sportsman, in which disguise our Illustra ion presents Mdlle. Déjazet), and becomes inebriated to a ridiculous excess; and, ultimately, the part of a simple youth is assumed. A rôle like this gives ample occasion for infinite variety, and in every change Mdlle. Déjazet is equally effective.

HAYMARKET.

An interesting event took place at this theatre on Saturday evening—a surprise pleasant alike to audience and actress. Mr and Miss Vandenhoff appeared in a new play, entitled "Woman's Heart," but the discovery that the heroine and poet were the same person was reserved for the close, when the success of the piece had been determined beyond dispute and without a doubt. Then it was that Mr Vande hoff announced, with "proud gratification," the fact of his daughter's authorship. The play is highly creditable to the lady It is the product of a pure and beautiful mind; and though somewhat delicate for the stage, will raise Miss Vandenhoff in public estimation. Always known to be intelligent, it was not known that her intelligence was creative; but this ascertained, she is now entitled to take rank among persons of poetic genius The subject of the drama is well chosen, and contains two at least very a ractive situations. The interest lies in the arts to sentiment In the first of these situations, an artist, Angiolo (Mr Barry Sullivan), is engaged in modelling a statue from a blind girl, Isolina (Miss Vandenhoff). The pose of the heroine was very charmingly contrived, and the incidents were well brought out. Angiolo's merits procure him the patronage of his Prince (Mr Howe). Removed to court, he neglects Isolina—who, however, follows him—to learn that ambiti n and not love is now the pole-star of his life. At this juncture, her own relationship to the Duke Albrizzi (Mr. Vandenhoff) is discovered. His wife had entrusted their daughter to the care of a peasant, dying herself of grief Out of this discovery grows the next great situation of the drama. Angiolo is sent by the Prince to take the portrait of the Duke's daughter, and finds—as we mentioned, has been restored to sight. Albrizzi, having heard her tale of discarded love, imposes silence upon her and him. The situation is interestingly embarrassing, when officers enter and arrest the young artist for a scandalous picture in which its manner has been imitated, at the instance of Count Zalamea (Mr Stuart) The Count's motive for this treacherous proceeding was the love which a lady Giulia (Miss Amelia Young) apparently entertained for the young artist. The remaining two acts are occupied with the plot proceeding from the new situation of affairs. Angiolo had always felt remorse for his abandonment of Isolina, and Isolina still loves him, notwithstanding his inconstancy. But Albrizzi wishes her, from aristocratic pride, to wed the Prince Ultimately Angiolo's innocence is proved, and he is set at liberty. At this view take place as to his father and Prince are fain to surrender the faithful Isolina to the impulses of her "Woman's Heart." What we have s ated will be seen to be the outline of this new drama, and records the verdict of the house By way of set-off, it only remains to add, what, under the circumstances, might have been expected, that the piece is somewhat deficient in point of structure, and the last acts are comparatively tedious. The beauty of the dialogue throughout supports the interest; and for this Miss Vandenhoff merits very high praise indeed. The success of the performance was chiefly owing, also, to her own acting, which was in parts exquisite. That of Mr. Sullivan was likewise energetic and full of meaning. Mr. Vandenhoff himself was, of course, excellent.

DRURY LANE.

"Too Late for the Train," is the title of a new farce by Mr. J. M Morton, the stage manager. It was pr-duct on Tuesday. The hero, a Mr. Burdock Brown, is personated by Mr. Tilbury, who prev ous from meeting an intended excursion to Oregon by the arrival of his daughter and son-in-law and her former husband, who detain him with their matrimonial and amorous squabbles. The piece was very s y, but deci ledly colloquial, and may probably answer the end for which it was obviously designed.

ADELPHI.

"A Leghorn Bonnet," being a translation of the French five-act farce at "Le Chapeau de Paille d'Italie," was p oduced on Monday. By a process, marvellous in its way, the incidents have, in this adaptation, been compressed into one act. They are accordingly crowded to excess, and the dramatic amusement are consequently increased. The search after a bonnet exactly similar to that favoured by the hasty horse is pursued through spalling difficulties. Messrs Wright, Bedford, and S. Emery were more than usually droll; and the whole affair, in the breadth of its humour, is irresistibly comic.

MUSIC.

ORGAN PERFORMANCE BY MR. W. T. BEST.

It is certainly passing strange that this vast metropolis should be without a great modern hall, containing a fine organ. Liverpool has not only its admirable concert-room in the Philharmonic Hall, but will soon possess one of the largest organs in the world, now constructing for S. George's Hall, by Mr. Willis, whose immense instrument still remains in the Great Exhibition Building. The Birmingham Town hall, with its gigantic organ, forms a permanent source of musical attraction to the population. In it is huge capital we have Exeter-hall and Hanover-square Rooms with organs that no distinguished player would condescend to touch for solo display; and the only chance we have enjoyed for an organist is in the churches, where he must not perform secular music. It is only, therefore, when an organ-builder wishes to try some instrument he has constructed for a church or chapel, that he invites a necessary limited number of amateurs and professors to assemble in his manufactory; and there, amidst timber planks, wood and metal pipes, wind-trunks, sound-boards, bellows, pulleys, grooves, trackers, wooden and iron rollers, backfalls, stades, &c., dispersed in all directions, amidst whitewash and workmen's benches, and the whole dimly lighted with a stray gas-light or two casting candles, may be heard the performance of that favoured writers for the "King of all instruments," expounded by some well-known player. Such an occasion was afforded last Tuesday night, at Mr. White's factory, in Mandeter-street, Argyll square. Now road, a locality as difficult to find as most as the sources of the Nile; but narrow as were the ways, no ordinary treat was supplied to the adventurous amateur who penetrated to the interior of inquiring its fame to the capital, Mr. Best, who is yet young, has recently settled here. Attention has been drawn to his performances for the organ and pianoforte, and it he has not displayed the highest order of creative genius, he has at least written enough to prove that he is an excellent musician, with clear conceptions that reflect honour on his taste and judgment. As an organ performer he must be enrolled in the front rank of English players. He has not her the poetic temperament of Mendelssohn nor the stately grandeur of Schneider, but in wonderous mechanism, both in hand and foot, Mr. Best possesses the highest claims for honour and distinction. His performance on the Mendelssohn organ—the last—was a masterly display of skill in G. by C. G. Hadrian, an ingenious trio-fugue in A, by J. L. Krebs, the superlatively grand toccata in D minor, by J. S. Bach; Handel's concerto No. 6; a Spohrish concertstück in C minor, by J. G. Töpfer; the melodious and charming finale to J. S. Bach's second sonata; and a pretty but trivial concerto in B flat, by Martini The toccata was the event of the night, and its enormous difficulties were conquered by Mr. Best with consummate skill. He was evidently influenced, if not inspired, by the dramatic character of the toccata. How much time must have been devoted by Mr Best to hard practice is palpable, from his thorough mastery of the keys and pedalboard. His style is neat, clear, and finished; the manipulation pure; no out-easily and precisely: no intricacy of device and invention in the text appears to dismay him; the breaks in the charges of madness are scarcely apparent; the aberrat ia and eccentricities of genius are there, and Mr. Best accomplishes all feats without much visible effort In the movement from the Bach sonata, the tiring contrary motion, arising from the use of two manuals and pedal at one time, never disturbed the even tenour of his delicate rendering of the subject. He was immensely applauded; and among the those who appeared most to have been most appreciated by him were Silas, himself a first-rate organist; Hamper, the pianist; and Mr Lucas, the organist. The organ, which is the present of an amateur to the new church at Hampstead, is a 16-feet one, and is of excellent quality

MUSICAL EVENTS.

M. Salabert, the vocalist, gave an evening concert, last Tuesday, at the Mertone-street Rooms.

Mr. Neate, the pianist, gave the first of a series of Quartet and Pianoforte Soirées last Wednesday, at the Queen Anne street Rooms, assisted by M. Sainton, Mr Cooper, Mr Hill, and Signor Piatti.

The second of the monthly concerts of Ancient and Modern Music took place on Wednesday night, at St. Martin's Hall, under Mr. Hullah's direction. The programme comprised Beethoven's "Mass in C" and his "Choral Fantasia," the pianoforte part in the latter being sustained by Mr. George Russell, a pupil of Sterndale Bennett. The secular selection consisted of the overture and second act of Weber's "Oberon." The vocalists were Mrs. Wass, Miss A. Syers (a pupil of Sir G. Smart), Miss Adeline, Miss Gibb, and Miss Kent, Mr. Swift, and Mr Wallworth.

The monthly performance of Sacred Music by the pupils of the School for the Indigent Blind took place on Wednesday afternoon, at the asylum in St George's-fields.

Mr. Stammers, the speculator in the once popular Wednesday concerts, gave a musical entertainment on the 18th inst., at Exeter Hall The sole Instrumentalists were Mr. Blagrove and Mr. Willy, pianists; Mr. Richardson, flute; M. Lavigne, oboe; M Prospère, cheo ede, and the vocalists were the Misses Messent, Stabbach, R. Braham, Lowe, Landon, Aleyne, Broughton, and Wells; Messrs. Leffler, Lawler, Swift, and the world renowned Master of Ceremonies, the evergreen Braham. Herr Anschuez was the conductor. The attendance was very indifferent; and if large measures at the renewed series of London Wednesday Concerts are to be secured, it must be by the abandonment of the cap-trap system, and by the exercise of judicious and conscientious exertions, to provide a well-balanced programme and an adequate execution thereof. Except in the case of some popular display, the orchestra but rarely made quite to the size of the hall, the vocal gleanings exhibited genera l a lamentable want of ambitious mediocrity, coarseness, and above limess of execution. The veterans do or was like to do us much, of course: he had an immense reception; but we regret his reappearance, model as he is still, in modern singers, for deficiency of articulation, intellectual reading of words as well as of notes, and for no-orial distinction. His best successful efforts were in the "Fine Old English Gentleman," and "Bay of Biscay." In the former he introduced a new verse, in the encore, applicable to British courage in invasion, which told strongly.

Mr. Lindsay Sloper gave the second of his soirées of pianoforte music on Thursday, at the Queen Anne Rooms.

The musical entertainments for the ensuing week are varied and interesting On Monday the Sacred Harmonic society will perform Handel's "Samson," under Costa's direction. On the same evening Mr. Henry Smith will give a concert at the Assembly Rooms, Hanover Square. On Tuesday will be the first of Mr. Ella's Musical Winter Evenings; and on Friday the London Sacred Harmonic Society will perform the oratorio of "Samson," under Mr. Surman's direction.

Owing to the indisposition of Mr. Sims Reeves, he was unable to sing in "Elijah," at Exeter Hall, on the 11th inst, and Mr. Benson undertook the music at a short notice, and sustained it with credit. On Thursday he returned to Brighton to recruit, and is to re-appear at Drury-lane Theatre to-night, in "Fra Diavolo."

Amongst the instrumental engagements for the new Philharmonic Society, at Exeter Hall, are Sworn as true violin, Piatti, as principal violoncello, and Bottesini s principal contrabasso.

M. Sainton, Mr. Cooper, Mr. Hill, and Signor Piatti have announced a series of quartett concerts at Willis's Rooms, under the patronage of her Majesty and Prince Albert, for the ensuing spring.

Mr. Brinley Richards, the pianist and composer, by his two gratuitous concerts at the Town-hall, Carmarthen, has added £60 to the funds of the infirmary.

Under the most gracious patronage of her Majesty, Monday's performances at Drury-lane Theatre will be for the benefit of the sufferers by the loss of the Amazon, and the most eminent musical talent in the metropolis will be displayed on the occasion, including the singing of Signora Favanti, former y or her Majesty's Theatre.

THE KING'S CONCERTS AT EDINBURGH.—Sir Henry Bishop once held the chair of music, endowed by the will of General Reid, in the Edinburgh University, but, disgusted at the attempted degradation of the position by the Senatus, he resigned his Professorship. The present occupant, Mr. Donaldson, who has studied in Germany, has been appointed by the Senatus, in order that the provisions of the Reid bequest should be legitimately carried out, and he has already met with success in the law courts On the 13 of January was the anniversary of the birth of the late General Reid, when a Reid was so anxious should be indicative of the state of art in his day, and of musical taste. The Senatus voted £20) for the expenses, a sum totally inadequate to carry out the intentions of the testator, he therefore sought further for musical purposes. Mr. Julian Adams conduc ed the programme The principal artistes were Miss Bassano, Miss C. Nott, Miss Day, Signori Sivori, Bottesini, Herr Reichart, &c. The Senatus refused to use the Concert, not having had the entire disposal of the tickets, but the Hall was quite filled.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

MUSIC IN PARIS.—In the cast of Beethoven's "Fidelio," at the Théâtre des Italiens, Mdle Cruvelli is Leonora; Md le Lorbari, Marcelina; Calzolari, Florestan; Soldi, Jaquino; Beletti, Pizarro; and Bouhil, Rocco. Herr Hoffer is the conductor. The two overtures in E and in C are played—the former before the rising of the curtain, and the latter before the last act. Up to the 16th inst. "Fidelio" had been given five times, and was nightly gaining in favour. On the first four acts of Halévy's "Juif Errant" are ready, so that its first representation is not expected before "Jeanne de Maladerta," for the début of his daughter, will soon be produced at the Opéra Natiena. Thalberg is about to leave Paris for an extended tour in North and South America, Asia, and Africa. The total receipts from concerts in Paris, in December, were 732 803f. 80c. (£28,913), being £4568 less than in the previous month.

MUSIC IN GERMANY.—Madame Sontag's tour in Germany has been most triumphant. During the present season she sang at Leipsic, in Donizetti's "Figlia del Reggimento." She is now at Stuttgard, and is the life of the court. In it her Ecker's "William of Orange." Herr Schumann is writing an opera on Lord Byron's "Manfred," which will be produced at Weimar, by Liszt, who so carefully brought out Wagner's last opera. A mass, composed by the Earl of Westmorland, the English Minister in Vienna, was exeou ed on the 2d inst., at the Church at Ober-Dobling, in presence of the notabilities of the Austrian capital. The noble and accomplished amateur, who has writ en in every school, sacred and secular, is a Protestant. The "Olympia" of Spontini is having a great run at the Royal Theatre in Berlin, owing to the talents of Mdme Koester and Mdle. Wagner. A new opera, entitled Der Prophet, by Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," "Prophète," has made a great hit in Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia." Herr Kapelmeister Neuhart's famed Cathedral Choir, which created such a sensation at the National Concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre in Nov., 1850, have been singing as concerts in Berlin with equal effect. The new opera by Marschner, "Austin," has been produced under the composer's direction, at Hanover, with the greatest success. Lindpaintner, the "father" of pianists, and perhaps of all musicians, Elias Kurlaender, has lately died at Prague, in his hundredth year. He was born at Konigsberg (Prussia), lived a long time at Berlin, and was one of the earliest pupils of Clementi in London.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.—Mdlle. Lind has postponed her departure from the United States until the spring. A telegraphic despatch from the Boston correspondent of the New York Herald announces the marriage of Jenny Lind, at Boston, on February 5 to Otto Goldschmidt, the German pianist, who has been accompanying her in her late tours. The Herald expresses its disbelief of the statement. Its correspondent (who, however, asserts that he saw the certificate), on the ground of this statement, has called upon the bridegroom, at first with Signor Belletti, the singer, and then with Mr. Burke, the violinist. The great Norwegian violinist, Ole Bull, arrived in New York on the 16th ult. Miss Catherine Hayes is announced to appear at Hamburgh on the 15th inst., under the President's patronage, assisted by Herr Munzig, Mr. Kyle, flautist, and Herr Grebel, violinist. Mr. Adams as Sra am, it is stated, will accompany Signora Biscaccianti in pianoforte duets. Sedelmeier, the German pianist, who has been accompanying her in her late tours. THE BOY-COMPOSER, PIANIST, AND VIOLINIST.—The French and German papers are full of the astonishing performances and compositions of Fredrick Gerschom. He was born at Hamburgh, in July, 1841, his father is a doctor. The boy was taught the pianoforte by his mother, at six years of age, and displayed much marked intelligence, that he was placed under Herr Lubbe, the director of music at Worms, and now a professor at Strasburg. In 1850 Frederick Gernschein became the pupil at Frankfort of Eckert, for the violin; of Wolf for the piano; and of Hauff for composition. On the 6th of May, 1850, he made his debut at Frankfort, and since that period has played at Carlsruhe and Strasburg, concertos and other pieces of Weber, Hummel, Mendelssohn, Mendelssohn, &c., for the pianoforte, besides conducting the orchestra. His concertos, &c., have appeared at Leipsic, Paris, and Frankfort; two works of Haydn and Beethoven, for violin and instruments. He has also written some lieder, one of which is dedicated to Bontag, who made him a present of the complete score of Mozart's quatuors. He is shortly to visit Paris.

CHESSLYTE R reading—We quite agree with you that it is highly desirable that the Committee of the Meeting Club should make some change in the arrangements of the meetings. Instead of a hour before the usual time of opening, it was thought by some desirable to allow visitors to have a supper after it.

E. M.—We shall probably decline to examine any more of first attempts at Problem making; and we must request to prevent any further errors that no Problem or Enigma be sent to us for insertion with the name, residence, or proposed publication for a time withheld.

SOLUTION OF PROBLEM No. 421.

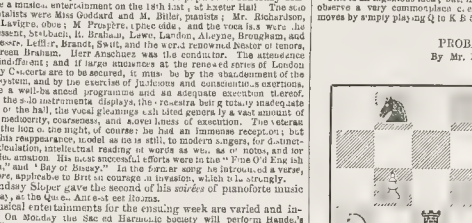
Double check and mate.

This is an ingenious idea; but, in following it out the author has omitted to observe a very commonplace co.ckmate, which White may give in fewer moves by simply playing Q to K 8 5th.

PROBLEM No. 422.

By Mr. BIDSON, of York.

BLACK.



WHITE.

White to play, and mates in five moves.

Instructive contest between Mr. LIEWENTAL and Mr. HODGES, the leading player of the Berkshire Chess club.

17 B to K Kt 2d	P to K B 4th	34. B takes R	P to Q Kt 5th
18. Kt to K 4th (e)	Q to her 2d

And the game was resigned as a drawn battle.

(a) P to Q 4th is considered a stronger line of play.

(b) Had he taken with the Kt, the game would have ended in a few moves by White playing at once K to Kt 6th, and afterwards taking with K's Bishop at the proper moment.

(c) The Pawn is very evenly won, and in a way Mr. L had evidently never calculated

(d) The Pawn appears to be a check, which would have availed nothing by taking the Bishop; for, suppose—

WHITE.	BLACK.
15	Kt takes B
16 Kt takes Kt	Q takes Kt
17 R takes B, &c.

(e) Well played again. Throughout the whole of this game it must be admitted that the young player has the advantage, both in style and strategem, over his more experienced opponent.

(f) In Chess it is often more difficult to make sure an advantage than to acquire it. The Pawn, so skilfully won and safely kept up to this time, is now thrown away It would have been better to have played the Pawn to the first square in front of each of its.

(g) The move, although apparently simple and unobvious on sight, is quite correct when he played his Book to Q 2d.

CHESS BY CORRESPONDENCE.

After a duration of some months the game played by correspondence between the Chess Club in connexion with the Literary and Philosophical Society of Preston, and the Lancaster Chess Club, has just terminated in favour of the former. The following are the moves:—

(a) Preston's play in this variation is not correct; from its nature, a very animated contest, not much unlike the one a sort of the present opening would have been expected to produce, but the move in the text is not to be commended. Early in the ensuing spring "a fleet of gondola steamers" will be placed on the river, to run between London and all the piers to Richmond. They are to consist of a number, of a new and novel construction, resembling somewhat in form the gondolas that ply on the canals of Venice. A splendid saloon occupies the whole of the after part of the vessel, with a promenade above. Most of them are building at Liverpool.

The committee of the Royal Asylum of St. Ann's Society have placed at the disposal of the Mayor of Southampton a free pass, for any orphan child—orphan or not—who may be amongst the sufferers from the loss of the Amazon.

THE FAMILY ECONOMIST, fifth year of publication The objects and character of this work are declared to commend it to universal favour. It relates to the Domestic Economy of the Industrious Classes, to all that increases the comforts and secures the elevation of HOME Income and Expenditure, Food and Cookery, Clothes and Clothing, Houses and House-furniture, Children and Education, Home Duties and Pleasures, Self-culture and Improvement, Hints on Gardening, &c., form the staple of the work Although addressed more especially to the working classes, it is useful to every household that it inculcates, but a wise and improving regard to ALL the duties of domestic life.

"I think," says a popular writer, "that the 'Family Economist' is so well educated, and so unflaggingly keeps up its character, that one must be very hypercritical if we wish to find any fault in it. Or to be able to do so, and very presumptuous to offer any suggestions for its improvement. It is strictly what it professes to be, and what it professes to do it does well."

The four volumes already published form a Treasury of Information relative to Domestic and Rural Economy. Price 5s 6d per vol. half-bound, in paper cover London: GROOMBRIDGE and SONS, Paternoster-row Sold by all Booksellers

ENGLISH SONGS AND MELODIES.

THE POETRY BY CHARLES MACKAY.

WORDS OF THE SONGS.

MAY-DEW.

[AIR—"There were three jolly hunters."]

[The superstition upon which this song is founded is prevalent in many parts of England, but is not confined to this country. It is believed in most parts of Europe, with some variation of detail, that a peculiar charm and efficacy belong to the early dew gathered on May morning. Among the most conspicuous of its virtues is that alluded to in the song—its power of preserving female loveliness.]

I.

From peaceful slumber waking,
With sunlight on its wings,
To hail the May-morn breaking,
The happy sky-lark sings.
So arise, arise, unclose your eyes,
Fair maids, the day has dawned for you;
And try the spell through mead and dell
That haunts the morning dew.

II.

Come forth, and find it gleaming
Like jewels on the grass,
And bathe your eyes, bright beaming,
And ripe lips, as you pass.
And your eyes shall shine with light divine,
Your cheeks their youthful bloom renew,
And time shall spare your faces fair,
By magic of the dew.

III.

But if you doubt the trial,
And smile to hear the tale,
I know, beyond denial,
A charm that cannot fail:
Try thought refined, the simple mind,
Good humour bright, and feeling true,
And you need not seek for eye or cheek
The magic of the dew.

YOU LOVE ME NOT.

[AIR—"Tom Bowling."]

I.

You love me not as once you loved,
Your face your truth denies;
And when you speak of faith unchanged,
I doubt you by your eyes.
A spirit looks from you to me,
Discovered though unseen,
Whose whispers mingle with your own,
And tell me what you mean.

II.

The secret sympathies of love
Give warning to my pride;
Your look, your smile, your very touch,
Reveal what you would hide.
I cannot prove the truth I feel,
But, ah! my heart is sore;
The dreams of happy love are pass'd,
The world is mine no more!

FALL, OH, FALL!

[AIR—"Now, oh, now."]

I.

Fall, oh, fall, ye words of anger,
Like the leaves when autumn blows,
Like the May-blooms in the river,
Like the moonlight on the snows!
Fall like seed in barren places,
Fall like rain-drops in the sea,
Idle words, foredoom'd to perish,
Lost between my love and me!

II.

But, ye words of loving kindness,
Fall like grateful summer rain,
Like the heat on frozen waters,
Like sweet music heard in pain!
Like the dew on op'ning roses,
Like the acorn from the tree,
Fall, ye accents of affection,
Fruitful to my love and me!

NOTES ON THE MELODIES BY SIR H. R. BISHOP.

MAY-DEW.

"THERE WERE THREE JOLLY HUNTERS." This air is a lively and very graceful specimen of the music popular among the peasantry of England. It has been taken down from recitation in the hop-districts of Kent; and, as far as the Editors of this Publication are enabled to ascertain, is now for the first time printed. Its merits are quite sufficient to recommend it to higher circles of musical taste than those to which it has previously been confined.

YOU LOVE ME NOT.

"TOM BOWLING."—One of those beautiful melodies which Charles Dibdin composed for his own sea-songs. The vast number of Dibdin's musical productions of a great portion of which he wrote the words and music—is at once a proof of his industry and the amazing fertility of his genius. It is said that his dramatic pieces, and those entertainments of which he was both the author and composer, and in which he was the sole performer, altogether contained upwards of twelve hundred songs. Some of Dibdin's songs in The Deserter; his ballad, "Then farewell, my trim-built wherry," in The Watermen; "I locked up all my treasure," and "While the lads of the village," in The Quaker,—have long been established favourites. Time has had no other effect on them, nor on the plain but expressive melodies of many of his sea-songs, than to heighten their charm and increase their popularity. It is perhaps worthy of notice that, shortly after the termination of his engagement at Drury Lane Theatre, Dibdin attempted a "new species of public amusement," which was somewhat similar in its nature to the ingenious and much-admired Marionettes of the present day. Dibdin's exhibition, however, appears to have been of a musical character; though whether on that occasion his figures sang, or rather were supposed to sing,—whether any aspiring Mandane made her debut in the opera of Artaxerxes, or any pretty Polly was brought forward in The Beggar's Opera,—we are unable to say.

FALL, OH, FALL!

"NOW, OH, NOW!"—A melody full of taste and feeling, the composition of Dowland. In the year 1588, John Dowland, then at the age of twenty six, was admitted to the degree of Bachelor in Music at Oxford. His compositions consisted chiefly of Part Songs, Madrigals, and Music for the Lute,—for his performance on which instrument, as well as for his singing, he was highly admired, as appears from the testimony of Shakspeare in the Passionate Pilgrim:—

"Dowland to thee is dear, whose heavenly touch
Upon the lute doth ravish human sense."

Dowland's "First Booke of Songs or Ayres of foure Parts, with Tablature for the Lute," was published in 1595; and some years afterwards he produced a work bearing the quaint title of "Lachrimæ, or Seaven Teares figured in Seaven passionate Pavanes (the Pavan was a solemn and stately kind of dance), with Lessons other Pavans, Galiards, and Almands, set forth for the Lute, Viols, or Violons, in five Parts." Anthony Wood, in the Fasti Oxonienses, says of Dowland, that "he was the rarest musician that the age did behold." This eulogium, however, must refer to Dowland's playing on the lute; for, considered as a composer, he was inferior to Bird, Dr. Bull, Morley, Thomas Weelkes, and other English musical writers of the same period. Dr. Burney, in his General History of Music, has taken some pains to undermine Dowland's merits as a composer: but Burney should be read with some caution; for, although a scientific musician, a learned historian, and an elegant writer, he was not, in many cases, a just critic. Dowland is certainly deserving of praise; and the very points of objection to him upon which Burney particularly remarks, are to be found in those compositions of Purcell on which the Doctor, in a subsequent criticism, has lavished the full meed of admiration. One of Dowland's latest works was a translation from the Latin of a then celebrated treatise on music, by a German styling himself Andreas Ornithoparcus. The preface to this translation is dated from Dowland's house in Fetter Lane, the 10th of April, 1609.

No. 547.—VOL. XX.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1852. [SIXPENCE.

THE CHANGE OF MINISTRY.

THE Russell Administration has fallen a few days before the catastrophe was anticipated. That it should have died of Sir Charles Wood's prepared or imagined Budget, of a defeat upon its colonial policy, or even upon Lord John Russell's new Reform Bill, seemed not only possible, but highly probable. A different fate was, however, reserved for it. Considered as a mere party move, it was politic in Lord John Russell to seize the opportunity afforded by the accidental, and by no means important, defeat which he suffered on Lord Palmerston's motion, and to throw up office. To have been defeated on the Budget, would have been bad; to have been ousted on the question of Reform in Parliament, would have been worse; and to have been censured for suffering the mismanagement of the Cape colony and our colonial empire generally, would have been more damaging than all. As any one of these catastrophes was likely to occur, Lord John Russell and his colleagues should be much obliged to Lord Palmerston, who certainly intended them no such kindness, for the more popular pretext for resignation which he placed in their way. But whatever may be the opinion which the country at the present time, and history in future, will form of the late Administration, and of the manner in which at last they relinquished office, the Whigs have now an opportunity of retrieving their lost ground. Now that they are no longer in power, we may expect that the old traditional virtues and energies of the party will once more have the fair play which the charms and the exigencies of office denied them; and that in opposition, where they have often so brilliantly distinguished themselves, they will once again do battle in the national cause, and entitle themselves to public gratitude. Lord John Russell, Lord Grey, Lord Carlisle, Lord Granville, and even the venerable, and we may say illustrious, Lord Lansdowne, whose graceful and eloquent farewell to Parliament as a Minister of State will long linger in the popular recollection, are men too eminent and too able not to do their country service in the difficult time that may be approaching. Whatever their faults as a Ministry may have been, they have committed none as individuals to unfit them for a career of future usefulness. They bear historical and honoured names, and are men of the highest character as well as talent. The country will have need of them. They represent great principles; and it should be remembered of them in the hour of their downfal, that it was in many instances not their fault that they were unable to carry these great principles into effect. They were Ministers in a peculiar and exceptional period, and were a weak party only rendered strong by the contrast exhibited by the greater weakness or any and every other party that opposed or supported them. To do little, was their safest policy; and if at the present time the littleness of their doings might be thrown at them as a reproach, they might reply that if they did little good, they did less evil. If they gained no glory, they incurred no great disgrace. If they did not end a Kaffir war, they extinguished an Irish rebellion; and if they were Ministers longer than they ought to have been, it was their opponents who were to blame, and not they. It was not their fault that Lord Derby did not take office a twelvemonth ago, but Lord Derby's own for not being ready.

But the country is more interested in the policy of the new, than in the virtues or the failings of the old Administration. Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli are Ministers at last. The list of the Cabinet is complete, and all the principal, and most of the minor, offices are filled up. The nation will await with curiosity the programme of their policy There is no arguing with necessity. The fall of the Russell Administration, and the accession to power of Lord Derby and his friends, were equally inevitable. The country in general being convinced of this fact, and that at present no other Ministry is possible, will allow Lord Derby a fair trial, and meet with disapproval any factious attempt, come whence it will, to impede the business of the nation, or throw unnecessary difficulties in the way of the Government. Yet, while the public are thus disposed, it is in vain to deny that the composition of the Ministry, even in the absence of a formal programme of their intentions, is of a nature to excite something more than mere curiosity. A feeling of anxiety, not to say of alarm, is aroused when it is remembered that the new Ministry does not come into power as the opponent of the last upon any great questions of general policy, but as the opponent of Free Trade, the triumphant affirmation of which principle in the year 1846 saved Great Britain from the dangers of a fearful revolution, as all the world except the Protectionists, will allow. Lord Derby himself has so recently as on the opening night of the present session endeavoured to show the party that elevated him to the perilous and thankless office of the leader of Protection that he still disapproves of Sir Robert Peel's act, and that he is not indisposed to interfere with the settlement made by that statesman. Mr. Disraeli appears to be of a different opinion, for we find that on the 11th of February, 1851, a few days after the opening of the last session of Parliament, he announced "that he had abandoned the cause of protection in so far as any Parliamentary effort to overthrow the system of Free-trade was concerned." Mr. Henley, another of Lord Derby's colleagues, also expressed his acquiescence in Free Trade as an accomplished fact, which, being a fact, it was not desirable to disturb. It is possible, therefore, notwithstanding Lord Derby's prediction for a fixed duty upon corn, that the new Ministers, although representatives of Protectionist principles, may be wise enough to let the matter alone, at least for the present, and to devote their energies to the more pressing and immediate business of the country. Although, with the exceptions named, the members of the Ministry may be considered men of strictly Protectionist principles, and pledged to carry them out, there is reason for the belief that in the actual circumstances of the country and of all Europe, this question may not be immediately mooted. But upon this point the public will patiently await the Ministerial explanations.

But, leaving all questions of their policy, real or supposed, to be discussed at a future time, we may, in the interval, without fear of being justly open to the reproach of unjust, invidious, or unseasonable criticism, express the surprise felt by a large portion of the public at the personal composition of the Cabinet, and the strange distribution of important offices. Against Lord Derby as Premier, and Sir Edward Sugden as Lord Chancellor, there is nothing to object. Neither can a word be said against the right of Mr. Disraeli to be considered the Ministerial leader in the House of Commons, and to hold a high office in the Administration; but that he should not have been contented with the office of Home Secretary, and that he should have thrust himself into that of Chancellor of the Exchequer, is indeed to be lamented for Mr. Disraeli's own sake. A statesman who only a year ago expressed his belief that the English agriculturists should be allowed to grow tobacco, and that a large portion of the poor-rates should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, might possibly make a good Home Secretary; but, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, he will excite derision, if not consternation. Even Sir Charles Wood—whose abilities in this important office were not of the highest order—showed, in the most brilliant and triumphant manner, in 1850, and again in 1851, how absurd, and worse than absurd, were the financial projects of Mr. Disraeli. Equally strange are some other of the appointments that have been made. The minor offices filled by the Duke of Northumberland, by Lord Lonsdale, by Lord Salisbury, by Lord John Manners, and others, are unexceptionable. The same may be said of all the legal appointments. But who is the new Home Secretary? and what has Mr. Walpole done to have such greatness thrust upon him? Will not the colonies be as surprised as England is when they learn the name of the new Colonial Secretary, Sir John Pakington? And will not all the diplomatists, armed or unarmed, of Europe feel even more than surprise to learn that the successor of Lord Palmerston and Lord Granville in the Foreign-office is—Lord Malmesbury? Yet it is possible that Lord Malmesbury, Sir John Pakington, and Mr. Walpole may have in them the stuff of which statesmen are made; and that Lord Derby, in selecting these three unknown men for such high offices, has not acted without good and sufficient reason. We hope it will prove so. A Derby Administration was inconvenient sooner or later, a matter of necessity. Until it had been tried, there was no hope of a really effective Government in this country. In exhibiting strength or weakness, that Administration will equally serve a good end. If it be strong, it will be a change for the better; and if it be weak, it will lead to new combinations of parties, and to the ultimate establishment of another Administration in which the country will have confidence. At all events, the day of inaction seems to have passed; and, either with a dissolution of Parliament or without it, we may expect stirring business during the next few months.

CAPTURE OF TWO SLAVERS IN THE MOZAMBIQUE CHANNEL.

(From a Correspondent)

I ENCLOSE you a rough Sketch of the destruction of two slave vessels, off the island of Querimba, by H.M.S. Penguin, Thomas Etheridge, Esq., with the following short account of the affair.

On the 3d of November, whilst running along the land, a vessel was discovered at anchor in a small bay off the island of Querimba. We immediately bore up towards her; and when about two miles off, not being acquainted with the anchorage, hove to, and sent a whaler with two men, in charge of the master's assistant, to board the stranger, who had hoisted Spanish colours. When the boat was within 100 yards of the vessel she slipped her cable and made sail, apparently running for a passage between the islands. The mate of the vessel fired at the boat, when she was close alongside, but without doing any damage. A brisk fire was returned by the whaler. In a few minutes the stranger struck on a coral reef, and was immediately boarded and taken possession of by the whaler. She proved to be a fine barque of 600 tons, completely equipped for the slave trade, carrying two long guns, with a crew of forty-five men, three of whom were away with the captain. She was from the Havana, and had intended to ship 1000 slaves on the following day. It was found impossible to get the vessel off, as she went on shore at high water. It was, therefore, determined to set her on fire, which was accordingly done on the following day.

On the same morning (November 4th), whilst at anchor near the barque, we saw a large "dow" coming out. A boat was immediately despatched after her, and she was taken possession of, though not till her crew and about thirty slaves had effected their escape on shore. She was found not to be seaworthy, and was, therefore, sunk.

Two days after the destruction of these two vessels, at daylight, we discovered a sail, and immediately started in chase. At seven A.M. observed H.M.S Orestes in the offing; at eight the latter was near enough to fire at the stranger, a large brig, who hoisted Spanish colours, but took no further notice of the firing, though several shots passed through his sails. The Orestes soon dropped astern, and we continued the chase alone. The Spaniard (another slaver) was observed throwing spars, &c., overboard, but did not much increase his distance. We made every endeavour to come up with him, and by great exertions with sweeps, &c., kept within two miles of him all night. Next day we tried the boats, but the wind being very light; but, after pulling for six hours in a burning sun, and there being no chance of coming up with the slaver, they were obliged to return on board. We kept sight of him till midnight, and then lost him altogether. The chase lasted 42 hours, and extended over 170 miles. 2000 slaves are said to be ready for embarkation in the barracoons, all for Cuba, in Brazilian vessels, and have been here for some time. Slaves are cheap, 10 dollars only being paid for a full-grown man.

THE NEW PREMIER.

In the Gratis Supplement to be published with the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for Saturday next, will be given a copious Memoir of the new Premier, the Right Hon. the Earl of Derby. The Portrait of his Lordship (engraved upon the preceding page) is from Mr. Selous' picture of the Opening of the Great Exhibition, for which Lord Derby sat as one of the Royal Commissioners, and for permission to engrave which we are indebted to the courtesy of Messrs. Lloyd Brothers, to whom the picture belongs.

THE NEW MINISTRY.

The resignation of Ministers in consequence of the adverse majority in the House of Commons, on Friday night week, upon Lord Palmerston's amendment to alter the proposition of the Government, relative to the calling out of the militia, so as to render the force contemplated a "general" instead of a "local" militia, which latter was the Government plan, was published in our second edition on Saturday last.

At the meeting of the House of Commons on Friday night, Lord J. Russell made a short statement of alterations which he proposed making in his scheme as originally proposed.

Lord Palmerston, who had previously given notice of his amendment, immediately rose, and in an able speech showed that the alterations of Lord J. Russell were very much to the effect which he aimed at in his amendment, namely, to make the force a "general" and not a "local" militia, that the latter would be of little value in the contingency contemplated, viz. an invasion; while the "general militia," with its readiness for immediate service, and its liability to serve in any part of the United Kingdom, was the force which the occasion required, that Lord John Russell's proposed force would be "neither one thing nor the other," and that, therefore, the proper course for the House to take was to adopt his amendment, which would render the force a "general militia," and would call it by its proper name.

This reasoning prevailed with the House, and on a division Lord Palmerston's amendment was carried by a majority of 11, the numbers being for the Government, 125; against it, 136.

On this result being announced, Lord John Russell declared his intention of at once resigning, which he did on the following day; and on Sunday, the Earl of Derby having been summoned by her Majesty to form a new Ministry, the noble leader of the Protectionists at once applied himself to the task, and the following is the result:—

It is, however, understood that when his recovery is complete arrangements will be made for his joining the Administration of the noble Earl.

Lord Jocelyn has not accepted office under Lord Derby's Administration.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

On Monday a meeting was held in Marylebone, which was presided over by Mr T. E. Baker, the senior churchwarden of St. Pancras, and at which the members for the borough (Benjamin Hall and Lord Dudley Stuart) attended. The hon. gentlemen having addressed their constituents in favour of a more liberal measure of reform than that which had been proposed by Lord John Russell, resolutions were adopted in accordance with their views. One of these resolutions (we are told "That any Ministry which should propose a law to tax the food of the people will call forth such an expression of just indignation as will prove highly injurious to the revenue and dangerous to the peace of the country." An address to the Queen, founded on the resolutions, was agreed to, and the proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to the chairman. Sir Benjamin Hall, in the course of the observations which he addressed to the meeting, commented in very strong terms on the members of the new Ministry, whom he considered open to animadversion. He said:—We were now in a crisis, as it was called. We were to have new Ministers, and he would read a list of them (Here he read the list given elsewhere, each name of which excited groans and laughter.) There was one very curious appointment—the Woods and Forests, Lord John Manners—the gentleman who had once stood for the city of London, and who somewhere in his poetical works expressed the wish—

Let laws and learning, trade and commerce die,
But God preserve our old nobility.

(Cheers and laughter.) The man who was to be the leader of the House of Commons, Mr. Disraeli, had in 1833 issued an address to the electors of that borough; and he (Sir B Hall) would take care that, at the next election, that address went before the electors of Buckinghamshire. Mr. Disraeli at that time said:—"It is possible that the Tories may imagine that there are two modes by which the aristocratic principle may be restored—first, by force; secondly, by a coalition between the two aristocratic parties. But, believing that it is utterly impossible to restore the aristocratic principle, and believing that unless some principle of action be infused into the Government a convulsion must ensue, what are the most obvious methods by which the democratic principle may be made predominant? It will appear that the most obvious methods are the instant repeal of the septennial act, the institution of election by ballot, and the immediate dissolution of parliament. I record here my solemn conviction, and the result of my own unprejudiced meditation." Those were his words; but why should either the democratic or aristocratic principle be made predominant? (Hear, hear.) He (Sir B. Hall) had travelled all over Europe, and was certain that in no country were the aristocracy more regarded than in this country, so long as they recognised the rights of their fellow-subjects. (Hear, hear.) This was the man who, in 1833, demanding these measures, and as little dreaming of protection then as he (Sir B. Hall) did of voting for it now, was called to the councils of his Sovereign, and was to lead the House of Commons. (Hear, hear.) He despised and contemned such a man. (Cheers.)

On the same evening a meeting of the inhabitants of Finsbury, called for a similar purpose, was held in the Music-hall, Store-street, over which Mr. Thomas Duncombe presided, and at which Mr. Wakley, the second member for the borough, attended. The chairman addressed his constituents in condemnation of Lord John Russell's Reform Bill, as being too limited in its propositions. Mr. Wakley having followed on the same side, resolutions were adopted in favour of

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

TUESDAY, Feb. 26, 1852.

We are this week in all the noisy tumult of Carnival, which expired on Tuesday night, or more truly on Wednesday morning, to the sound of countless orchestras not only the Grand Opera, but several of the minor theatres, and all the salles de bal, throwing open their doors for masked balls. These balls are dull affairs in London, but surely not more so than in Paris, for nothing can be more melancholy than the mirth and antics of the masquers. On Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday, the Boulevards were crowded by gazers to see masquers and equipages which were not. But, alas! the mutability of all sublunary things is specially visible in the decadence of our splendid Carnival displays. A stray fiacre filled with sorry attempts at costume, and a few ill-disguised vagrants on foot, were all that presented themselves to the expectant eye. For the splendid equipages of bygone days, in which Princes, ambassadors, and the highest aristocracy used to vie with each other in brilliancy, we have a long array of cabs, superannuated hacks, and spring carts, among which anything like a decent turn-out creates a positive sensation. In fine, the Municipal Guards, a well appointed fine body of men, were decidedly the most respectable parts of the display. At night things looked a little more gay, on the principle la nuit tous les chats sont gris: the numerous costumiers lighted up, the numbers of fiacres flying about in every quarter from ball to ball—all foreigners, be it noted, who wish really to see the Carnival in Paris, go round to all of them; the balance of fun, and the curious interest arising from national manners, being decidedly in favour of those lowest in the social and Terpsichorean scale. Of this class the most famous, and certainly the least respectable, is La Courtille, a guinguette, or dancing-house in the suburbs. Here the Carnival saturnalia may be witnessed in its wildest excess; so much so, that the scene at daylight on the following morning, on the breaking up of the company, is one of the regular sights of Paris, and is witnessed by thousands: the jaded features, costumes soiled and torn, bacchanal women notous and "unmentionable," from excitement, sunk in stupid and brutal from fatigue and intoxication—the whole scene bespeaks a night spent in exhausting excess and licentiousness. This is, however, the darkest side of the picture; for better society, the Carnival terminates in the cabarets of the Maison Dorée and the Café de Paris, amid all the elegances that Paris can afford.

A coup d'état has just taken place in the artistic world, which excites the greatest surprise. M. Duban, the architect who had been commissioned to repair and terminate the Louvre, was peremptorily ordered to abandon the splendid undertaking he had already commenced and partly accomplished, immediately after a visit of the President to the Palace. No reason is assigned for this mortifying dismissal. M. Ascomi is appointed to succeed M. Duban.

The gardens which surround the Place de la Concorde at some depth below its level are now being filled up: they are to be replaced by platforms, which will be turned to good account during the public fêtes for illumination, &c. They will also be marvellously adapted for placing artillery en batterie, if such physical force measures are found necessary.

The picture-gallery of Marshal Soult is announced for sale in April next. It contains several chef-d'œuvres of the Spanish school—Murillo and Velasquez being the principal masters. The two gems of his collection—"the Parasytic" and "St. Augustin," both by Murillo—were sold at enormous prices, a few years ago, to Lord Tomline. "The Parasytic" had been originally purchased from the Marshal by the late King Louis Philippe, for £20,000. In consequence of a speech made by one of the Ministers at the Chambers of Peers on this transaction, the Marshal returned the purchase-money to his Majesty, and afterwards the picture passed into the hands of the nobleman above mentioned, for £8000.

This week has given us a new drama and a new opera comique, both successful. The drama is M. Emile Augier's, and was on the first night patronised by the presence of the Prince President. Its title is "Diane," and it owes no small share of the favour with which it was received to Mdlle. Rachel's having undertaken the principal character. The scene is laid in the reign of Louis XIII., and the interest turns upon the devotedness of Diane to her brother, doomed to death under the atrocious edict of Richelieu, for fighting a duel; she sacrifices her love in order to save his life. Some passages in the play bore strongly upon the existing state of affairs in France, and occasioned tumults of applause from one part of the audience, which were met with significant dissent from the other. The scene which chiefly led to these demonstrations was one between the King and Cardinal Richelieu, whom the Monarch sternly reproaches for keeping all power and authority in his own hands, and leaving him but the empty name of King. The language pointed so visibly to the late position of the President of the Republic and the Assemblée Nationale, that the assertion since made by the author's friends, that the coincidence was wholly accidental, is very difficult to credit. I give you a specimen, roughly and rapidly translated:—

The King. Yes! I would be master,
And not thus wear the empty show of power,
Without the privilege to act or feel
From my own head or heart. Nc, no! I'm weary
Of numbly yielding where I should command—
To be the shadow of authority,
And move a puppet in another's hand.

Violent cheers and counter-cheers followed this passage, showing that the poor Assembly has still some friends left in Paris. The following, put into the mouth of Richelieu, led to a demonstration still more pointed:—

In times of lawless anarchy and strife,
Like these fierce times we live in, one stern law—
The law of force—alone can save a State,
And men and things must bend or break before it.

These lines were a signal for another contested expression of opinion Not so, however, the following couplet, inimitably delivered by Rachel and addressed to Richelieu:—

Mais l'histoire dira, que dans votre œuvre immense
Il manque une grandeur suprême à la morale!
(And that your mighty work, shall history say,
One crowning grandeur wanted—honesty!)

The effect of this little passage was positively electrical on the audience. Three distinct rounds of cheering followed its delivery.

FRANCE.

The 24th of February, the anniversary of the proclamation of the Republic of 1848, has come and gone without even interrupting the maskings and gaieties of the Carnival, so completely has the tide of recent events swept over and obliterated all the most cherished and characteristic of the impressions and associations of the last and most futile of all the revolutions of France. The only indication that there were still among the community some who clung with fond tenacity to the belief that the efforts of that period were not wholly vain, was an ineffectual attempt on the part of a small body of persons, on Tuesday, to excite a public manifestation by putting immortelles at the foot of the column in the Place de la Bastile. As soon, however, as these mournful memorials were deposited, they were removed by the police, and the knot of passers-by whom the incident had collected were immediately dispersed to mingle with the merry throng of mummers on the Boulevards.

A protest of a different character, but more damaging from its quiet satire, was made against the present order of things on the same day by the Presse newspaper, which re-published the letter addressed by Louis Napoleon to the Provisional Government on his return from exile, in which he hailed the new Republic as the regeneration of France, and declared his only ambition to be to serve it, and to show his devotedness to the men (Ledru-Rollin and his colleagues) who then represented it!

The approaching elections for the Corps Législatif create some little bustle in political circles. The Prefect of the Seine has issued an address to the electors of that department, which comprises the capital, recommending them to make choice only of those candidates who are sincerely devoted to the new order of things; and, to accomplish that result, this functionary mentions nine individuals who, he thinks, ought to be returned as members of the Corps Législatif. To choose any others, he says, would be a disavowal of their past conduct, considering they formed part of the 200,000 who on the 20th of December again placed in the hands of Louis Napoleon the destinies of France. Nevertheless, a list of opposition candidates for Paris has been published, and, it is understood, adopted by a large number of voters in all the electoral divisions of the metropolis: there are—for the 1st division, M. Dupont (de l'Eure); 2d, Gen. Lamoricière; 3d, General Eugène Cavaignac; 4th, M. Carnot; 5th, M. Michel Gondchaux; 6th, M Bixio; 7th, M. Eugène Sue; and 8th, M. Ferdinand de Lasteyrie. An impression seems to be very generally prevalent that Cavaignac, if elected, will, immediately on taking his seat in the Assembly, rise and protest, in the name of the Republic, against all that has been done since the coup d'état of the 2d of December, and that he will then quit the Chamber.

M. Dupin, sen., the President of the late Legislative Assembly, declines being nominated as a candidate for any place at the ensuing election.

A reward of 50,000f is offered for discoveries applying the voltaic rile to heating, lighting, chemistry, mechanism, or practical medicine. The prize is open to savants of all nations.

The President gave a grand ball at the Tuileries on Monday night, at which 4000 persons were present.

A decree of the President of the Republic directs that general officers and admirals named Senators, and not provided with any command, are to be considered as being en disponibilité, and may be replaced according to the wants of the service may require. They remain, however, in such case liable to be called to commands on active service, and to form part of the Council of Admiralty, the Council of Works of the Navy, and to the Committees of the Army. This arrangement is applicable to both the sea and land service.

Nubar Bey, Secretary to the Pacha of Egypt, has arrived in Paris, on a special mission.

The court-martial at Clamecy has condemned several persons more to transportation or imprisonment for being concerned in the late insurrection.

M. Bocher, the administrator of the Orleans property, has been arrested, together with three other persons, and is to be brought to trial on the charge of "having and distributing seditious printed documents without a name of a printer, and unstamped." The "seditious documents" consisted of the protest of the testamentary executors of Louis Philippe against the confiscation of the Orleans property, the letter of the Orleans Princes on the same subject, and other similar papers, such as the concession made by Louis XIV. to his legitimised son by Madame de Montespan, the Count de Toulouse, who was father of the Duke de Penthièvre, whose property descended to the House of Orleans. These papers were strung together on a single printed sheet, under the heading, "Facts for the Defence of the Rights of Property against the decree of the 22nd of January, 1852," and were circulated with a view to proceedings being taken in the French courts of law to dispute the legality of the confiscation decree. The other three persons arrested were in the service of the Parcels Delivery Company, to which the distribution of the papers was entrusted.

SPAIN.

From Madrid we learn that on the 18th instant, as previously arranged, Queen Isabella, who is now perfectly recovered from her late wound, proceeded to the church of the Atocha to return thanks to God for the double blessing of her escape from the dagger of the assassin Merino, and the recent happy birth of a Princess. The streets were crowded on the occasion, and the troops lined the route of the cortège. In the balconies, which were decorated with much taste, thronged groups of ladies stood, holding bouquets in their hands, and doves decked out with ribbons and poetical devices about their necks, to let fly on the passage of the Queen.

At half-past two o'clock a salute of artillery announced the departure of the Queen from the palace. Twenty young girls, dressed in white, carrying garlands of flowers, preceded by a band of music, opened the march, and were followed by the rich equipages of the Spanish grandees. Next came twelve Court carriages drawn each by four horses, and in which were seated the officers of the Queen's household, and the carriages of the Infante don Francisco de Paula, father of the King, escorted by a detachment of cavalry. The Duke and Duchess of Montpensier, who followed, were in a landau, the taste and richness of which were only exceeded by the carriage of the Queen. Her Majesty came next, and with her was seated the Princess Royal; she was accompanied by the King and the nurse of the infant Princess. As the Royal equipage advanced, flowers and devices were thrown down from the windows, doves were let fly, and the cries of "Viva la Reina!" mingled with the roaring of the artillery. The Queen looked well, and appeared delighted with her enthusiastic reception. The procession was closed by the authorities of Madrid and a squadron of cavalry. At the church of Atocha her Majesty was received by deputations of the grandezas, of the Senate and Chamber of Deputies, and the municipal authorities.

The most perfect order prevailed, and the Queen returned to the palace amidst the same demonstrations of joy and affection. When leaving the church the Queen gave orders that no change should be made in the decorations, and that the magnificent illuminations of the altar of the Virgin should be continued until the presents which she intended to make to it had arrived. At seven in the evening a magnificent carriage drawn by eight horses, and escorted by cavalry, arrived at the church, with the valuable offering. In the state carriage were the Camerara Major and the Grand Major Domo of the Queen, holding in their arms a large basket, covered with a cloth embroidered with the Royal arms. These functionaries were received at the door by the clergy, and having alighted, the basket was carried in procession to the church. The Count de Pino Hermosa than said that he had been commanded by her Majesty the Queen to place at the feet of the Queen of Heaven the dress and the jewels which her Majesty had worn that day, when she solemnly presented her dear daughter as a visible testimony of her filial devotion, and her gratitude for the bounties which Heaven, in its powerful protection, had bestowed upon her. The basket was then placed upon the altar, and the covering removed. The dress that it contained was that which the Queen wore on the 18th, and which she also wore on the 2d, when she received the wound from the poignard of Merino. Some marks of blood were visible on the cloak. The jewels consisted of a necklace in brilliants. The Grand Major Domo explained that the corouet which had been worn by her Majesty had not been seen, as it was undergoing some alterations, but that at the moment they were completed he would bring it to the church. At night the whole city was illuminated, and her Majesty went to the Teatro del Principe.

On the 19th the Queen held a grand levee of Ambassadors, and at night gave a magnificent ball at the Palace.

BELGIUM.

Much loose rumour has been current of late as to the menacing attitude taken by Louis Napoleon against the independence of Belgium and Switzerland; but the difficulties of a contest in the latter case, and the barrenness of the results to be derived from hostilities with the Republican mountaineers, show pretty clearly that the independence of the Swiss is not in very great danger. It is otherwise with Belgium; and the material advantages to France of the "annexation" (as the Yankees would phrase it) of that country hold out such temptation to the Head of the French Executive, that the insolent demande discourtesy to the Ministers of Louis Napoleon to the Government of King Leopold relative to the expulsion of M. Thiers and other French refugees, and also to the press, especially the Bulletin Français, lately established at Brussels as the organ of the refugees, and the fact of King Leopold finding himself in a position to be obliged partially to yield to these demands, have awakened the attention of those powers which have guaranteed the independence of Belgium to the aspect of matters, and we learn that the Emperor of Russia (who is one of these guaranteeing powers), having obtained from King Leopold the dismissal of the Polish officers in his army, has undertaken to supply a large force for the kingdom in case of an attack by France.

The following is an extract from a communication dated Brussels, the 19th inst., giving some interesting particulars on the subject:—

A convention has been concluded between our Government (the Belgian) and Russia, whereby the latter engages to furnish 100,000 men for the defence of our territory, in case it should be invaded or seriously menaced by France. Should the Baltic be open, these troops (including the Imperial Guards) are to be transported by a Russian fleet to Antwerp.

Prussia promises us assistance to a like extent. The object of the present mission of the Prince de Ligne to Berlin is to arrange the modus operandi.

Our own army numbers 90,000, of whom 70,000 would take the field, and the remainder occupy our fortresses

Holland, interested in the protection of Luxembourg, agrees to furnish a contingent of 30,000.

Hopes are entertained that England, as one of the powers guaranteeing the independence of Belgium, will co-operate with a fleet in the Scheldt and a garrison for the citadel of Antwerp.

But you see that, independent of England and Austria, who might weaken our enemy by a diversion on the Mediterranean, our northern coalition musters 230,000 men—a force quite sufficient to repel the threatened invasion, if not chastise its authors at a second Waterloo.

This country still swarms with French spies and police agents.

I am assured, in a trustworthy quarter, that the Emperor of Russia has ordered the 50,000,000 francs which he invested in French Rentes in 1847 to be transferred to the Dutch funds, as he does not consider his money safe in France after the Orleans confiscation.

UNITED STATES.

Accounts dated the 11th represent the proceedings in Congress as chiefly relating to the very delicate subjects of the propriety of Congress declaring in favor of Kossuth's doctrine of intervention with foreign States to enforce non-intervention (.) for the benefit of Hungary, and also with a view to obtaining from Great Britain the pardon of Smith O'Brien and the other political exiles transported from Ireland in 1848. On this latter subject we learn from Washington, that Mr. Webster (the Secretary of State), by and with the President's approbation, had some time since written to her Britannic Majesty's Government in favour of the liberation of these misguided men.

Kossuth was still prosecuting with great pomp in the western States. He was introduced to the Ohio Legislature on the 7th. He made a brief speech, in which he compared the United States to a new Moses on a new Mount Sinai, shouting out, with a thundering voice, to the despots of the world, "Remember this shall be a law, in the name of the Lord, you and our God, Ye shall not kill nations—ye shall not steal their freedom—ye shall not covet what is your neighbours's." He also spoke of two remarkable coincidences—the State of Ohio and himself had the same birthday, and the tidings of the present day would reach Washington when the senators of the United States were sitting in judgment on the question of international law. He had reached the city of Cincinnati, where his reception was enthusiastic in the extreme. In several of his speeches he complains that the greater portion of the money contributed for the purposes of the Hungarian mission is spent in dinners and processions, and that he fears he will not be able to pay for the large quantities of firearms which he has ordered

Despatches from Mr. Lawrence, the American Minister in London, have been received at Washington, in which Mr. Lawrence states that Lord Granville had made an apology for the attack upon the Prometheus, and expressed the greatest desire to preserve amicable relations with the United States. "There are some questions," says the New York Journal of Commerce,

Between the two Governments as to the construction of the Nicaragua treaty, and these questions are forthwith to be settled. Mr. Lawrence has urged upon the British Government the propriety of the abandonment of their pretensions in regard to the Mosquito territory. Lord Granville has referred the whole matter, and he has authorised Mr. Crampton to enter into a negotiation on the subject. Mr. Crampton is to have full powers, so far as the matter is concerned.

The Government of his Holiness the Pope had contributed a block of marble from the ruins of the ancient Temple of Peace at Rome, for the erection of a monument to Washington in the United States capital.

The citizens of New York had presented Mr. Clay with a gold medal, in acknowledgment of his services to the Union.

By advices from Galveston, we learn that the bill providing for the payment of the debts of the late Republic of Texas had been ordered to a third reading.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST.

THE Right Hon. Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, Kt., LL.D., Dean of the Arches, and Judge of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, was the younger son of Robert Jenner, Esq., of Doctors' Commons, and of Chiselmarc, Kent, by his wife Anne, eldest daughter of Peter Birt, Esq., of Wenvoe Castle, Glamorganshire, the inheritance of which came by the marriage to the Jenner family.

Sir Herbert Jenner Fust was uncle of the present proprietor of Wenvoe Castle, Robert Francis Jenner, Esq., who married, the 10th of August, 1824, Sir Herbert's eldest daughter. Herbert Jenner, afterwards Fust, was himself born on 1778. After going through the usual course of a University education, he was called to the bar in 1800 and obtained his Doctor's degree in 1803. He soon acquired considerable practice and reputation in the Ecclesiastical Courts, and became King's Advocate in 1826, when he received the honour of Knighthood. In 1834 he was appointed Dean of the Arches, and Judge of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, and was then sworn a Privy Councillor. On the 14th January, 1845, Sir Herbert Jenner assumed the additional surname and arms of Fust, pursuant to the testamentary injunction of his kinsman, Sir John Fust, Bart., of Hill Court. Sir Herbert was made Master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, in February, 1846, and was, during a short time, one of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England. Sir Herbert married, in 1803, the youngest daughter of the late General Lascelles; by which lady, the sister of his elder brother's wife, he has had a numerous family. Dr. Jenner Fust stood deservedly high as an ecclesiastical lawyer and judge. His opinions and decrees displayed great clearness, knowledge, and sense, and they will ever form a very valuable part of the decisions of Doctors' Commons. The death of this learned and able Judge occurred on the 20th inst.

SIR ALEXANDER MACKENZIE DOWNIE.

SIR ALEXANDER died on the 3d inst., at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, aged 41. This eminent doctor, surgeon to the British Legation at Frankfort, and physician in ordinary to the Duke of Cambridge, was author of various medical works. He received the honour of knighthood in 1840, for his services and attention to the late Landgrave of Hesse-Homburg. In the same year he married the niece of Sir John Hare, of Bristol.

SHELDON CRADOCK, ESQ., OF HARTFORTH, COLONEL OF THE NORTH YORK MILITIA, AND FORMERLY M.P. FOR CAMELFORD.

This gentleman, the representative of the highly respectable Yorkshire family of Cradock, died a few days since, aged 75. He was the eldest son of Sheldon Cradock, Esq., of Hartforth, by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of Christopher Wilkinson, Esq., of Thorpe-on-Tees, and grandson of Sheldon Cradock, Esq., by Elizabeth his first wife, daughter of the Rev. Edward Place, Rector of Bedale. The Cradocks of old county of Durham, and were augured in Parliament's "Durham," commencing with Richard Cradock, living 16 Henry VIII., whose grandson, John Cradocke, "went into Yorkshire, and lived at Doe Park." By the death of Colonel Cradock without issue, the male representation of his house devolves on the family of Mr. Cradock, the publisher, of London, formerly of the firm of Baldwin and Cradock, Paternoster-row.

SECRET SOCIETIES AND THEIR EFFECTS IN FRANCE.—A very singular case was tried three days ago by the court of assizes of the department of the Nièvre. A woman, named Rose Fleury, of Saint-Pierre-Laguenay, was indicted for having killed her husband. They had been married twelve years, had one child, and had always lived happily together. In July last, she, in gossiping with her neighbours, learned that the Red Republican specialists were forming secret societies all over the department, and that they required persons admitted to them to take a solemn oath to abandon father, mother, wife, and children, to march with them. This made a great impression on her mind, and she had a good deal about it. In October last she was told that her husband had joined one of the societies, and that he had taken the oath. Profoundly affected, she, when he came home, reproached him, and told her child not to kiss its father again, as he intended to abandon them, to march with the Reds. "Yes," said Fleury, "it is true, I have sworn to sacrifice everything for the cause of the people; and when the Reds shall order me, I will abandon my wife and child and father and mother." "What!" she cried, "you have really sworn that!" "Yes," he answered, "and I will do it too; and," he added, "whilst I am away killing others, people will perhaps come here and kill you." Rose, who had a knife in her hand, then exclaimed, in great agitation, "Wretch! if you mean to do so, take that!" and she stabbed him in the thigh. The man cried, "Oh, my leg, my leg!" and fell, and shortly after he expired. Among the witnesses was a woman, named Vonchier, who deposed that he had admitted the unfortunate Fleury, with other persons, to the secret society, and that after his eyes had been bandaged the following colloquy took place:—"Are you a Republican?" "Yes." "Do you feel that you have the courage necessary to defend the Red Republic by all possible means?" "Yes." "Before anything further be said, swear to say nothing at any time of what is about to take place here." "I swear it." "Swear, 'I, a free man, swear to defend the Democratic and Social Republic.'" "I swear it." "Say, 'I swear to take arms against any one who may attempt to overthrow it.'" "I swear it." "Say, 'I swear to abandon wife, children, and all that I have dearest in the world, to defend the Republic.'" "I swear it." "Say, 'I swear to assist my brothers by all the means in my power.'" "I swear it." "Say, 'I swear to suffer the most infamous death, or to kill myself, if I should reveal the secrets of the society.'" "I swear it." "Now tell me, what does a brother who reveals the secrets of the society merit?" "Death." "If the lot were to fall on you to kill him, should you have the courage to do it?" "Yes." These oaths were, it seems, taken on a drawn sword. The public prosecutor, in addressing the jury, branded in strong terms the secret societies; but intimated that, under the very peculiar circumstances of the case, the jury might, without injustice, show indulgence to the accused. On this a verdict of acquittal was returned, and the poor woman, after a solemn address from the president, was set at liberty.

POLITICAL WRITING IN PRUSSIA.—Count Henry d'Arnim, member of the First Chamber of Prussia, and formerly Minister of Foreign Affairs, and ambassador in France and Belgium, was tried by the Chamber of the Criminal Senate of Berlin, on the 21st instant, for having published two speeches, one delivered in the First Chamber, the other intended to have been delivered so long ago as November, 1850, containing what the indictment charged as insults and calumnious attacks on the Government, but what, in reality, were but severe comments on the abandonment of Radowitz's war policy by the present Prime Minister, Mantauffel. The trial took place with closed doors. The public prosecuter demanded that the Count should be condemned to six months' imprisonment, and M. Bardeleben, formerly editor of the Constitutional Gazette, who printed the speeches, to three. But the Court only sentenced the former to a fine of 200 thalers (about £30.), and the latter to one of 100 thalers. The accused intend, it is said, to appeal.

DEPARTMENT OF PRACTICAL ART.

A department under the title, to have the superintendence over th[illegible] schools of design, and to be connected with other self supporting ins[illegible] which aim to advance education in art, has recently been organised at the [illegible] of Trade. The nature and objects of this depart[illegible]ment are shadowed forth in the following circular, which has recently been [illegible] to the [illegible] authorities which manage the schools of design:—

The Secretary of the Government School of Design, [illegible]

The Ocean of Brest states, that the Lords of the Admiralty of England have presented a gold watch to Captain Collier, of the Retribution, a handsome testimony for his exertions in saving twenty-five persons of the Ammoon steamer, burnt at sea on January 3. Queen Victoria has presented him with a gold medal; and the Transatlantic Steam-packet Company have given him £50.

Her Majesty's sloop Pantaloon, which arrived off Portsmouth on Sunday, reports the death of the Queen of Madagascar, after the defeat and degradation of the flower of her army in a contest with a belligerent chief, in November last.

Her Majesty's steam frigate Sampson, having on board the wounded from the squadron engaged in the late attack on Lagos, on the coast of Africa, anchored off Portsmouth on Sunday afternoon.

THE BATTLE OF CAPE ST. VINCENT.

THE 14th of February is a memorable anniversary in our victorious calendar, for upon this day, in 1797, Nelson achieved one of those brilliant successes which have contributed so pre-eminently to the glory of the British navy.

It will be recollected that early in the above year Nelson sailed from Porto Ferrajo with a convoy for Gibraltar; and, having reached that place, proceeded to the westward in search of the Admiral. Off the mouth of the Straits he fell in with the Spanish fleet; and on the 13th of February, rejoining the station off Cape St. Vincent, communicated this intelligence to Sir John Jervis. He was now directed to shift his broad pendant on board the Captain, 74, Captain R. W. Miller; and before sunset the signal was made to prepare for action, and to [illegible] during the night, in close order. The sequel is thus narrated [illegible] Southey:—

At daybreak the enemy were in sight. The British force consisted of two ships of 100 guns, two of 98, two of 90, eight of 74, and one of 64 fifteen of the line in all; with four frigates, a sloop, and a cutter. The Spaniards had one four-decker, of 136 guns; six three-decksrs, of 112; two of 84, eighteen of 74—in all, twenty-seven ships of the line, with ten frigates and a brig. Before the enemy could form in regular order of battle, Sir J. Jervis, by carrying a press of sail, came up with them, passed through their fleet, then tacked, and thus cut off nine of their ships from the main body, to which the Admiral was now able to direct his attention, it being still superior in number to his whole fleet, and greatly so in weight of metal. The Captain, after engaging with the Colosseo, three first-rates and three others, was joined by Captain Collingwood in the Excellent; the Captain being at this time actually fired upon by three first-rates, by the San Nicolas, and by a 74, within about pistol-shot of that vessel. The Excellent was ahead, the Colosseo crippled and astern. Collingwood ranged up, and hauling up his mainsail just astern, passed within ten feet of the San Nicolas, giving her a most tremendous fire; then passed on for the Santissima Trinidada. The diagram upon the next page will explain further. The San Nicolas luffing up, the San Josef fell on board her; the Excellent passing on for the Santissima Trinidada, the Captain resumed her station abreast of the San Nicolas and San Josef, and close alongside. The Captain, now incapable of further service, either in line or in chase, fell alongside the San Nicolas and carried her by boarding, Nelson himself boarding through the cabin windows. The San Josef was lying on the other side, and he led the boarders from the San Nicolas to her, with the cry of "Westminster Abbey or victory!" Their efforts were crowned with success, and on the quarter-deck of this Spanish first-rate Nelson received the swords of the Rear-Admiral and his officers.

Such is the spirit-stirring scene which the Artist, Mr. Carmichael, sided by the best authorities, has pictured on the ensuing page.

As a fitting accompaniment, we have also engraved

A COLOSSAL STATUE OF NELSON,

which is intended to occupy a prominent position in the hero's native county—namely, the market-place at Norwich. It has been executed, at the request of a committee of gentlemen, by Mr. Thomas Manes, who modelled a statuette of the hero in 1847. This was seen by a clergyman of Norwich, the Rev. Mr. Herring; and was next shown to P. N. Scott, Esq., of that city, and who was a collector of everything associated with Nelson's glorious memory. The statuette was then shown to the Bishop of Norwich; and in the Norfolk Chronicle it was suggested that there could not be a more fitting testimonial to Nelson's fame than a statue in the capital of the county in which he was born. A committee was accordingly formed for this object, the late Lord Bishop of Norwich, the Right Rev. Dr. Stanley, being the chairman; and since his lamented death that office has been filled by Samuel Bignold, Esq., one of the magistrates of the city and county

The Statue is highly artistic in composition. The likeness is very striking. The features are copied from a cast taken during life by Chantrey; and a bust, also from life, by Gahagan, admitted to present the marked characteristics of the original The artist has also closely copied the actual dress which was worn by Nelson when he received his death-wound on the quarter-deck of the Victory, at the battle of Trafalgar. The Statue is cut from a block of the finest Sicilian marble.

The city of Norwich already possesses the best portrait of Lord Nelson extant. It is suspended in St. Andrew's-hall, and is deservedly one of the principal objects of interest in the capital of East Anglia.

KEY TO THE BATTLE OF ST. VINCENT.

THE HON. SWYNFEN THOMAS CARNEGIE, COMMANDER OF THE THAMES.

The Hon. Captain Carnegie, youngest son of the late seventh Earl of North Esk, by Mary, only daughter of the late W. Ricketts, Esq., of Longwood, county Hants, niece of the first Earl St. Vincent, was born at Rosehill, Hampshire, on the 8th March, 1813; and on the 3d August, 1826, entered the Royal navy as midshipman on board the Undaunted, 46, then commanded by Captain Augustus William James Clifford. In the same capacity he served on board the St. Vincent, 120, at that time flag-ship of the Hon. Sir Henry Hotham, K.C.B.; the Rally, 18, Captain Abraham Mills Hawkins; and obtained his first commission on the 21st April, 1832 On the 9th of the following November he entered in the Castor, 36, under Commodore Lord John Hay; subsequently served under the same officer in the North Star, 28, as senior lieutenant, and for his exertions during this period in connexion with the operations of the civil war in Spain, he received the honour of the order of San Fernando; and, on the 28th June, 1838, was promoted to the rank of Commander. In 1841 he came forward as a candidate of the Peel party for the borough of Stafford, and was returned, after a severe contest, the numbers at the close of the poll being—Carnegie, 681; Bulier, 587; Holmes, 339

On the 10th of August, 1842, he took the command of the Orestes, 18, on the North America and West Indian stations, and afterwards, until February, 1844, of the Devastation, steam-sloop, in the Mediterranean. On the 10th of June, 1845, returning the rank of Captain, he retired on half-pay; in 1846, under the Peel Government, was appointed a Lord of the Treasury, and re-contesting Stafford on that occasion, was opposed by Mr. Edward Watkin, who had the show of hands in his favour, but did not go to the poll. Captain Carnegie having pledged himself to support the entire freedom of trade, and to which, during the period he retained his seat, he most honestly adhered.

He went out of office with the Peel Ministry; and at the general election in 1847, for the third time, contested Stafford, declared his resolution of standing in opposition to the accustomed corrupt practices of the borough, and avoiding all bribery and treating, and was defeated, the numbers at the close of the poll being—Urquhart, 754; Sidney, 516; Carnegie, 271; Lee, 6; Gordon, 1. Against this return Captain Carnegie petitioned. During his absence, however, and without his knowledge or consent, the petition, by virtue of Parliamentary agency, was abandoned In 1849 he was elected a director of the London and North-Western Railway Company, and became chairman of the stores committee of that company, in which capacity he has had to direct the letting of contracts, comprising above 2000 separate articles of raw material and manufactures, to the amount of more than half a million sterling per annum

As officer in command in defence of the Thames, Captain Carnegie has superintendence of the steam naval organisation at Sheerness.

THE HON. S. T. CARNEGIE, COMMANDER OF THE THAMES. FROM A DAGUERREOTYPE BY CLAUDET.

The Carnegies are of old distinction in the Royal navy, and have suffered in the service. The sixth Earl, grandfather of the subject of our memoir, died Admiral of the White in 1792. The late Earl had the honour of being third in command at the battle of Trafalgar, was afterwards Commander-in-Chief at Plymouth, and died Rear-Admiral of Great Britain on the 28th of May, 1831, in his 74th year. George Lord Rosehill, late brother of the present Earl, was lost in 1807, in his 16th year, on board the Blenheim; and Captain William Henry Lewis, uncle of Captain Carnegie, was drowned on the 26th January, 1806, by the upsetting of his barge, while in command of the Magnificent, 74.

THE BATTLE OF ST. VINCENT, FEB. 14, 1797.—DRAWN BY J. W. CARMICHAEL.—(SEE PRECEDING PAGE)

WILD-FOWL SHOOTING ON SHAPTON LEA, SOUTH DEVONSHIRE.—DRAWN BY COLEBROOKE STOCKDALE.

WILD-FOWL SHOOTING ON THE SOUTH COAST OF DEVONSHIRE.—BY COLEBROOKE STOCKDALE.

Having heard much of the wondrous doings at Shapton Ley, we started on Tuesday evening week, that we might see the sport which was to take place the following morning—a pleasant ride of some twenty miles, crossing the river Dart to the ancient town of Dartmouth, where the houses more and more overlap the narrow way as each successive story rises, shutting out the sun and blue sky from the grotesque forms, bustle, and dirt below. It is very unlike an English town, and the accidental appearance of a number of French sailors, gibbering their patois, made us almost believe we were away on foreign land. To guide our carriage through the narrow and intricate streets or lanes of houses, was a very ticklish operation; with the exception of a broken lamp, it was happily accomplished. Passing on some six or seven miles of ups and downs brought us to the door of the Sands Hotel, where mine host was ready to receive us, and made us right comfortable.

Shapton Lea, or Ley, as it is known in those parts, is a large lake of some three hundred acres, or more, fed entirely by fresh-water springs, although running close and parallel with the sea at Hart Bay, from which it is separated by a narrow belt of sand. The lake spreads out itself wider up the little valleys, amongst the hills which rise abruptly from its shores, and are fringed with small woods and furze; a few cottages at the further end constitute the hamlet of Tor Cross, and several church towers appear on the surrounding hills. The sun shining through our chamber window gave note that it was time to rise; and while breakfast was preparing, we went out upon the sands and looked upon the sea so blue and sparkling in the morning light, throwing in sport its waves upon the golden sands, and withdrawing them to leave behind a necklace of silver. We turned to look upon Shapton: not a cloud was upon the azure of the sky, a golden gauze seemed drawn over it, and the bosom of the lake received it in peacefulness, and brought it down to mingle with the fairylike hills and valleys which were there beneath its surface; so placid, broken only by the ripple, as the coots chased each other with delight, and dipped beneath the water to rise again with more sparkling plumage. Many hundreds of wild fowl flocked peacefully upon its surface, apparently in happy unconsciousness of the danger and onslaught soon to be made upon them. Not a human being was to be seen. We retired to breakfast. Returning soon, we found many gunners had gathered along the margin of the lake, and many others were eagerly crossing the sands to join them. The poor birds began to show symptoms of uneasiness, flying restlessly about, until some approached near the woods on the opposite shore: a curl of white smoke, followed by a smart crack, told of the opening of the war; the birds flew wildly about, and shots quickly followed each other. The wilder birds mounted high into the air, and made off for a safer retreat upon the waters of the sea, disdaining to descend to many a presumptuous shot, fired in the hope, by inexperienced hands, that their antiquated fowling-piece was gifted with an extraordinary long range. The coots, more timid birds, whose home is here, remained to die and give sport to the many hundred sportsmen assembled. It has been said by that experienced authority, Colonel Hawker, that these birds ought never to be shot on ponds, as they are so extremely picturesque in all their movements; and then, as to eating them, they must be preferred for the same reason as the Jack Tar prefers tough beef—"it takes more chewing." I asked a rustic sportsman what he intended doing with them? "To put him in a pie; and, sure enough, is capital eating." The gusto of this reply somewhat reconciled me to the slaughter. Seven or eight boats, with four experienced and favoured marksmen, put off upon the lake, and came sweeping down amongst the fowl. Bang, bang, and splash fall heavily the birds—hundreds hurrying away down the lake, receiving or taking broadsides from each side, soon thinned their numbers. Dogs are cheered in from the banks to bring ashore the killed and wounded; the latter, crying piteously, endeavour to elude their teeth by diving. Fierce conflicts occur to establish the right to a fallen bird. "It's mine. I shot it my dog fetched it," &c. A struggle, and the bird parts asunder—one has the head, the other the tail.

Guns of all sorts are pressed into the service—the rusty old yeomanry carbine, musket, and long duck-gun; and the substantial yeoman and squire has his Purdy's double, and Ely's patent. All are sportsmen for the day: the poor rustic and artisan, who would tremble to carry a gun at any other time for fear of being taken as a poacher, throws off his thraldom, steps out into liberty, looks at the sun bravely, and shoots at his mark like a man. The boats sweep up and down the lake laden with spoil; and at the hotel a feast is prepared, of which many partake, merrily vaunting the wondrous shots they have achieved.

THE MOMUNDS.—THE KAFFIR WAR.

(To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.)

Perhaps you are aware that a division of the Indian army, under Sir Colin Campbell, is at present out at a place named Michnee, near Peshawur, for the purpose of reducing to order the refractory tribes called the Momunds. I have just received a letter, and the accompanying

A MOMUND OF AFGHANISTAN LOADING HIS JEZAIL.

Sketch of a "Momund," from my brother, who is in the division: in the former he says—"We never returned a shot, for our muskets are not nearly so heavy as their jezails, and they were out of proper distance some of their bullets whistled and sung over our heads, and one struck a stone and flattened out beside one of the men."

Here is the old story of the inferiority of our muskets; and my brother's corps, moreover, is armed with two-grooved rifles, which I have heard the men themselves say were almost impracticable to load after firing a few rounds. Apropos of the musket question, of course, is the Kaffir war. Would it be a bad idea to suggest the transport of native troops to its seat from India instead of England (say Madras and Bombay), armed with jezails, or an approximation to them? They would be of much or more value in that kind of bush fighting; and the loss of a few of them would be rather a benefit than otherwise; they would be too happy to see some service, and the expense would, of course, be much less, not to speak of the comparative movability of their commissariat.

They have fought in Africa already under Abercrombie; let them now distinguish themselves there with Cathcart.

CHILLIANWALLA.

THE CEYLONESE SANITARIUM.

The accompanying Sketch, by a Correspondent resident in the colony, shows a portion of the plain of Nuwera-Ellia, the Sanitarium of Ceylon, This delightful spot is situated on the southern heart of the island, fifty miles from the sea-coast in a direct line, and is a table-land at an elevation of 6200 feet, surrounded by lofty hills, which are covered with jungle to their very summits, the highest, named Pedro-talla-gala, being the loftiest spot in Ceylon, and rising 2000 feet above the Nuwera-Ellia plain.

In the salubrity of its climate this Sanitarium is perhaps unsurpassed by any within the tropics. Here, in the immediate neighbourhood of the equator, even solar heat is rarely unpleasant; while in the shade the atmosphere is generally much below what of an English summer.

This climate, however, though delightful after the heat of the coast, though wonderful and invaluable within the tropics, has no pretensions to be considered English; the chief sanitary advantage to be derived from a temporary residence in it being as the prevention than the cure of disease -rather the strengthening of a debilitated constitution than the removal of organic tropical complaints.

Nuwera-Ellia is within easy reach of the coast of Ceylon, being 112 miles from Colombo, the maritime capital, and 72 miles from Point-de-Galle. Of this distance, the whole of which is by a splend d carriage road, equal to any in England, 144 miles, viz. from Galle to Kandy, can be performed in the daily and comfortable mail-coaches; and for the remaining 4 miles either wheel conveyances or riding horses are easily and cheaply procurable.

This station, besides its barracks for troops both healthy and convalescent, and the offices of its resident civil functionary, viz., the Catcherry, the Courthouse, the Gaol, &c., boast of a handsome and lately erected church (of which we append a View, showing its eastern aspect, sketched by Mr. J. Northmore, district Judge of Cornegalle, in the island), with a permanent clergyman; a neat and well stocked library, also shown in the Sketch; a capital hotel, several boardinghouses, and the numerous and tasteful villas of the wealthy of the colony; not to speak of its large native bazaar. Indeed, distinguished residents an Calcutta and other parts of India do not disdain, some to possess houses in, and many to visit, the most accessible, cheapest, and perhaps healthiest of the Sanataria of India.

We may add, that one of the largest rivers in Ceylon, the Mahn-vellagangs, though unfortunately but little available for commercial purposes, takes its rise at Nuwera-Ellia, through whose plain it meanders in the most picturesque manner.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1852.

The foreign policy of the Russell Administration, during the very short period in which it was deprived of the superintendence of Lord Palmerston, was characterised by at least one act of vigour highly creditable to the Government. Notice was given to the French President, that any attack upon the independence of Belgium—an attack evidently contemplated—would lead to the immediate occupation of the citadel of Antwerp by a British force of 10,000 men. It was also notified, if the public be correctly informed upon the facts, that this step was taken with the entire approbation and concurrence of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, who are severally and collectively prepared to maintain the independence of Belgium. It is remarkable, as showing the opinion entertained even by the absolute Monarch of Russia of the designs and character of the absolute Dictator of France, that the Emperor Nicholas, who for a period of twenty years has systematically refused to acknowledge the Belgian kingdom, has at length sent an Envoy to Brussels. The fact is highly significant; and, taken in conjunction with the notification made by Great Britain, appears to have had its influence on the mind of the French President. Perhaps, also, the unanimity with which the English press—the true representative of English feeling and opinion, whatever the Tory and the members of the late Government may assert to the contrary—has spoken out on the question of the national defences, has not been without its influence in the councils of the Elysée, if there be councils in such a place. At all events, the Moniteur has been instructed to disclaim on the part of the French Government any intention of aggression upon the independence of surrounding states; and to declare that, so far from desiring a war, the whole attention of the President will be directed to the development of the internal prosperity of France. Europe will form its own conclusions on this point; but will look to the deeds and not to the words of the French potentate. It is not likely, whatever may be the changes which the downfal of the Russell Administration may produce in England, that it will lead to any change in the relations of this country towards France. While France confines herself to her own affairs, there can be no other sentiments in this country but those of friendship and good-will towards that gallant and oppressed people, and a hope that the reality of freedom may not always continue to cloak their grasp. But neither a Whig nor a Tory Administration, nor any other, if another be possible, will abdicate its duty as the joint protector with the other powers of Europe of the independence of Belgium and Switzerland. Whatever may be the fatal necessities of the position into which ambition has thrust the French President, he will have to fight all Europe if he lay a finger on either of these nations; and we should think that, during as he is, he is not quite prepared for such an encounter.

While such are his prospects abroad, his career at home is of a character too violent and too unpopular to warrant the belief, that unless some unlooked-for change take place, in his policy as well as his character, it can be of long continuance. The deeds of all other tyrants recorded in history appear insignificant compared with those which the Paris correspondence of the London journals reports from day to day. The law upon the press is alone sufficient to sow the seeds of the overthrow of the monstrous despotism that conceived it; and the arrest of M. Bocher, one of the executors of Louis Philippe, for distributing among his private friends the documents by which, in the exercise of a sacred duty, he endeavoured to prove the injustice and illegality of the decree by which it is sought to confiscate the property of which he is a trustee, has created in France, and among all classes, a sentiment of disgust, no less than of indignation.

As for ourselves, we think it is an honour that the President and his advisers should have again prevented the circulation of the Illustrated London News in France. We have always spoken honestly of that personage. When, in the earlier period of his Presidential career, the burgraves, headed by M. Thiers, opposed a factious, ungenerous, and perilous opposition to his Government, we spoke out in disapproval of their conduct, and uniformly supported Louis Napoleon in his contest with the Assembly, as long as the contest was honourably and constitutionally conducted on his part. But when he treacherously and violently destroyed the liberties of a great nation, and proved false to the solemn trust reposed in him by the popular vote of the last week in December, we spoke the almost unanimous opinion of the English nation in denouncing his acts. We shall continue to speak of him as we find him—as Lord Derby, Lord Grey, and Lord John Russell would interpret our voice and that of the English press in general—in any spirit of hostility to the French people; on the contrary, in the interest of, and with the most genuine sympathy for, that people, we shall express our disapproval of the acts of a man who daily tramples on their most sacred rights, and does his best—or his worst—to deprive them of every liberty which they have purchased at the high price of a sixty years' struggle. If the English press do not denounce these acts, with the frequency and the severity which they demand, it is not for want of the will, but simply because they follow each other with such frightful rapidity of wrong, that journalists, like other men, become breathless with astonishment. This journal is we believe the only English newspaper that the French Government has prohibited. We expect ere long, however, to have many companions in the honour. The recent ordonnance leaves no room to doubt that the President has resolved not only to destroy the press of France, but to keep out every foreign journal that shall have the honesty to express its sentiments. He can do this, but he cannot prevent the English from writing, and the French from thinking; and the more the one write, or the other think, the worse it will be for the arbitrary system which Louis Napoleon is endeavouring to establish.

At the termination of the meeting the Earl of Derby entered his carriage, which was in waiting, and proceeded direct to Buckingham Palace, to have an audience of her Majesty, and submit for her approval the names of the noblemen and gentlemen composing the new Administration. The meeting was composed of the members of the Cabinet exclusively.

Letters have been received from the Alecto, 6, steam sloop, Commander Lavie, bearing date Sierra Leone, January 24, having arrived there from the south coast. On the 5th of December the Alecto was fortunate enough to capture her first prize. The slaver was first seen at daybreak, on which the steamer went in pursuit, and, on approaching, fired a blank cartridge to make her heave to; but this not having the desired effect, a shot was fired which fell pretty close, and probably hurrying the next might be closer than agreeable, she hove to. A boat was manned, and sent to take possession of the prize, on board of which was found 64 slaves.

We are requested to state that it was not the Bloodhound, but the Teazer, that grounded in the attack on Lagos.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET'S PLAN OF RIFLE CANNON.—On Wednesday Lord Clarence Paget, Sir Thomas Dyer, and a great number of the officers of the Royal Artillery, Royal Engineers, and 4th Light Dragoons, assembled in the marshes at two o'clock P.M., to witness experiments with rifle cannon. The shot and shells fired from the rifle cannon were constructed on Lord Clarence Paget's plan. They are made of cast iron, of a conical or sugar-loaf shape, and having attached at their base a ring of lead rather more than half an inch in thickness, and about two inches in depth, which, when fired, projects within and fills beyond the iron of the shot and shell, forming a hollow similar to the bottom of a common black bottle. The outside of the lead is cut with three threads of a circular character, similar to the threads of a silver screw, which enables the shot and shells easy to run home; and when fired, the lead expands and fills the four grooves, each about an inch in breadth by near an an eighth of an inch in depth. The firing took place from two 9-pounder field battery guns supplied at the royal field battery 9-pounder service, a solid shot of 9 lb. weight, and a charge of 3 lb. weight of powder, at a range of 1000 yards. The other, the rifle cannon, was supplied with Lord Clarence Paget's conical shot, which, from their elongated shape, weighed 17 lb., and the charge of powder was only one pound weight. When the firing took place with the rifle cannon it was difficult to ascertain the result, as the lead part generally became detached during the flight of the projectile, and fell on the ground at from 600 to 700 yards distant, the movement of the iron part was lost sight of, as it did not appear to strike the target or enter the mound behind it. A 9-pounder field battery gun rifled in a similar manner to the 9-pounder cannon, but with less depth of groove, was then taken to within 300 yards of the target, and fired with shells made on Lord Clarence Paget's plan, having a percussion cap placed on a nipple, and the cap on being found entered the target near the centre, bursting immediately on striking the bulk-head behind, throwing down the target and burying the iron part in the sand. On the rifle experiments were concluded on firing the two shells from the 3-pounder rifle cannon.

THE VALUE OF THE BAYONET AS A WEAPON OF OFFENCE.

A discussion has been raised lately in the columns of the Times as to the value of the bayonet in attack, in consequence of Sir Charles James Napier having called it in his recent pamphlet "the Queen of weapons." A correspondent who signs himself "Medicaster" writes, from St. Bartholomew's, to say:—"The evidence of an army surgeon ought to have some weight in settling the relative efficiency of weapons of destruction; and it is notorious that army surgeons will tell you that they have scarcely ever seen a bayonet wound. At all events, Mr. Guthrie's evidence (which I enclose from the Lancet of Saturday, Feb 14) is to this effect, and his experience in this branch of surgery is wider than perhaps that of any one else:—

"'Extract from Lecture by G. J. Guthrie, Esq., F.R.S.

"'A great delusion is cherished in Great Britain on the subject of the bayonet; —a sort of monomania very gratifying to the national vanity, but not quite in accordance with matter of fact. Opposing regiments formed in line and charging with fixed bayonets never meet; and strange it had to land and foot to look; and true for the best possible reason, that one side turns round and runs away as soon as the other comes close enough to do mischief. The battle of Maida is usually referred to as a remarkable instance of a bayonet fight; nevertheless the sufferers, whether killed or wounded, English or French, suffered from bullets, not bayonets. Wounds from bayonets were not less rare in the Peninsular war. It may be true that all those who were bayonetted were killed, yet their bodies were seldom found.'"

In reply to this, General Sir John Scott Lillie, after admitting the great value of any opinion on the subject from so experienced a military surgeon as Mr. Guthrie, says:—

"As an old soldier who witnessed the greater part of the battles and sieges which took place during close wars, I can confirm, as to the battle of Maida, this statement of the army surgeons as regards the hospitals, as I never witnessed a bayonet wound or two hostile lines came in contact, but this simple reason—that one party gave way, overcome by the fears of the moment, before it was physically vanquished. But this fact does not by any means tend to controvert Sir Charles Napier's reasons for championing the bayonet as the Queen of weapons; it leads, in my humble opinion, rather to support those reasons, as, when the great object in warfare is to make the enemy show his back as expeditiously as possible, the weapon that will tend the most effectually towards the accomplishment of this object ought to be regarded as the most efficient. Under these circumstances, I would recommend those amateur sportsmen who are desirous of making game of the enemy in the event of an invasion, to thank more of the bayonet and sword than of the rifle and rifle shooting at long distances, averaging, as some of your correspondents assert, from half to three-quarters of a mile. Sharpshooters covering the front of a line may amuse themselves in this manner as the enemy approaches, but the corps that mean to make him show his back should be concealed behind the summit or brow of an undulating plain, well selected across his line of march, and wait patiently until he arrives within 50 yards of the top, then suddenly appear in line, fire a well directed volley into his columns, and charge through the smoke, and, when the atmosphere becomes clear, the backs of their foes will be discerned describing much more rapidly than they ascended, all from 'the fears of the bayonet.' Therefore, in my humble opinion, and with all due respect for 'Medicaster's' statements, Sir Charles Napier is right in designating it 'the Queen of weapons.'"

THE "AMAZON."—It appears by the correspondence which has taken place between the Lords of the Admiralty and Admiral Commaney relative to the loss of the Amazon, which correspondence was printed on Wednesday by order of the House of Commons, in the instance of Lord Ward, that the latter defends himself from the charge of negligence in not at once sending a steamer to search for the missing passengers, on the ground that the agent of the Royal Mail Steam-packet Company "left him in a state of total ignorance of the event," and that all the passengers who arrived at Plymouth went to London without bringing him any intelligence of it! He further states, that it would have been contrary to the regulations of the service if he had despatched a steamer, when urged to do so by the Rev. Mr. Warburton, without the sanction of the Admiralty. If this be so, the sooner the "regulations of the service" are revised, the better.

Between twenty and thirty acres of furze were on fire near Hythe, in Hants, on Tuesday night. It is supposed to have been the work of an incendiary. The fire illuminated the sky for miles round.

COUNTRY NEWS.

THE MILITIA.—On Tuesday a very large meeting was held at Broadmead Room, Bristol, to consider the proposition for embodying the local militia; Robert Charlton, Esq., presided. On the platform were several of the leading members of the Society of Friends. Resolutions were adopted disapproving of the calling out of the militia at a time when the late Ministers assured the country that the nation was on terms of perfect amity with all foreign powers.

SEVEN LIVES LOST BY THE INUNDATION OF A COAL-PIT.—During the recent wet weather the water in the coal-mines near Rochdale had accumulated to such an extent, that on Wednesday evening, the 18th instant, between five and six o'clock, it suddenly burst through into the main drift of Messrs. Ashworth's mine, and the workmen there were all saved. Two of the colliers, being near the shaft, and hearing the noise of the rushing water, with great difficulty succeeded in reaching the cage, and were wound up in safety. Two other colliers, named Wm. Shepherd and Samuel Wrigley, were observed on the driftway, from which they were unable to escape in time, and were rapidly pursued by the rising water. On reaching the top of the driftway their further progress was impeded, and they were compelled to remain in a sporting, suspense the gradual approach of the water to within a few inches of the place where they stood, awaiting the doom which appeared inevitable. After remaining in this perilous situation upwards of six hours they were enabled to escape, through the subsiding of the water. There were still five boys and three men in the mine, for whose fate the most fearful apprehensions were excited. The lifeless bodies of Robert Shepherd and Samuel Wrigley alone were recovered on the following day. The former was thirty years of age, and has left a widow and four children. His body was much cut and bruised. Wolstenholme was a boy, 16 years of age. The names of the others are Benjamin Shepherd, aged 12 (son of Robert Shepherd); W. Gates, 30; T. Lees, 30 (both married men with families); and three brothers, Minny Howarth, 18; Robert, 14; and Noah, 16, sons of a farmer in the neighbourhood. Another young man we do not know, was taken out alive on Thursday, but five of the above persons have yet to be accounted for. The pit is 54 yards deep, and the length of the main drift is 250 yards.

ACCIDENT FROM THE EXPLOSION OF A STEAM BOILER.—On Monday morning a deplorable accident occurred at West-hill, Oldham, by the explosion of a steam-engine boiler, in a factory belonging to Messrs. Buckley and Clough, cotton-waste cleaners. The boiler, at the same time rushing out of the brickwork, leaped into the air, and pitched forward alongside and past the factory to a distance of 40 yards, what the back end of it, which was the part first giving way, was blown to a greater distance, passing in a double row of cottages at the west end of the factory. This part of the boiler was afterwards found 80 yards distant, and some of the bricks and cotton waste from the factory were found at a distance of 120 yards. The boiler, in its flight, struck the tall chimney of the factory, and caused it unfortunately to fall over upon the nearest cottages, almost wholly destroying two of them, and killing one of the occupants, Mary Newton, who was in the act of preparing her mother's dinner in the kitchen. She was assisted out of the cottage alive, but died within an hour afterwards, from bruises and scalds. Her son, a boy about eleven years old, was about fifteen yards from the door, having his back to the youngest child, 16 months old, and both of them were scalded. The child, Sarah Ann Newton, was also struck on the nose by a brick, and severely wounded. The lads sufferer died very shortly afterwards. Mrs. Wrathall, a neighbour, was in Mrs Newton's house, and also sustained a severe and dangerous blow on the forehead. James Howarth, the engine-tenter, was in the fireplace when the boiler exploded, and it went over his head; but he was thrown down by the sudden wind, and received no severe injuries on the spine and other parts of the body that his recovery is not expected. John Garlside, who was working at a wheel in the factory, was struck with a brick, and so severely hurt that he is not likely to recover. Three of the cottages had their doors and windows destroyed. The boiler had only been put down twelve months, but was an old one patched up.

REPRESENTATION OF THE COUNTY OF DOWN.—Lord Castlereagh has addressed his constituents, stating it to be his intention to give up his seat for the county of Down at the next election. In his statement of reasons for taking that step, his Lordship says:—"Many reasons indune me to adopt this course; but by far the most important one is the conviction I entertain that I no longer enjoy the confidence of the leading interests of the county. My refusal to concur with those who, after the Corn Laws had been repealed, were desirous of a return to protection mainly on the conduct I pursued with reference to the question of Papal aggression; my support of the grant to Maynooth; and, finally, my approval of the principle of the various landlord and tenant bills which have been introduced, have estranged me from a considerable portion of my relations which existed between many of my supporters and myself." The noble Lord further adds, that he still maintains his opinions on those questions.

DUBLIN UNIVERSITY.—On Tuesday the spring commencements were opened at Trinity College. The annual dinner was given in the common. The Lord Lieutenant honoured the company with his presence on the occasion. Amongst the persons honoured with degrees was the Right Hon. Fras. Blackburne, Q.C., who has been offered the Lord Chancellorship of Ireland under the new Ministry.

SOUTHAMPTON DOCK.—A half-yearly general meeting of the proprietors of this company was held on Tuesday, when a report was read, by which it appeared that, after all income tax, was declared out of net profits, after payment of the interest on debenture debt, preference stock, and all working expenses, repairs, &c., of £2401, which will leave a sum of £676 to be carried to the credit of the next dividend account.

THE ENGINEERS' STRIKE.—An aggregate meeting of the operatives and workmen of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers was held on Monday, at St Martin's Hall. The notice convening the meeting having been read, Mr. Joseph Musto was called to the chair. The chairman congratulated them that no complaint had as yet been made against the conduct of the men operating, although they had been out of employment for nearly six weeks. Mr. Newton and Mr. Cunningham severally addressed the meeting, urging the necessity of their perseverance in the course they were pursuing, and which must be successful. The declaration put forth by the employers for them to sign was denounced as a most arbitrary and unjust measure towards the operatives; and the conduct of the railway companies, who had lengthened cuts on the side of the masters, was declared to be most unbecoming. They should be met in a spirit of self reliance by the society of engineers, and with that confidence which the justice of their cause inspired. It was said that the strike had already cost the country £100,000. The establishment of co-operative workshops was determined upon, and the following resolution was unanimously adopted: "That this meeting, believing it to be impossible, with justice to the operatives, to resume work while they are called on as a preliminary to doing so to sign a declaration which would take from them all power of combination and every vestige of independence, pledges themselves to remain firm in their refusal to consent to the terms endeavoured to be enforced upon them." According to the Brighton Guardian, twelve of the workmen employed at the Brighton Railway station, in consequence of their continuing to contribute one day's wages per week towards the support of the strike bank, who are more or less connected with the Amalgamated Society, have received notice of dismissal. Mr. D. Salomons, M.P., has contributed £21 to the fund for the relief of the unskilled labourers thrown out of employment by the strike.

The Duchess of Kent has given a donation of £50 for the benefit of the Holmfirth sufferers, and a donation of £100 to the Society for Improving the Dwellings of the Poor at Windsor.

In addition to the promotions already noticed in the Gazette of Friday week, for the destruction of Lagos, the Admiralty have promoted the engineers in charge on board the Bloodhound and Teazer, viz. Mr. William N. Gover and Mr. George S. Thunder, first-class engineers, to be acting first-class chief engineers, who will be confirmed on passing the necessary examinations.

Mr. Morrison, of the firm of Morrison, Dillon, and Co., warehousemen, of Fore-street, City, is in treaty for the splendid estate of Appuldrcombe, in the Isle of Wight, the property of the Earl of Yarborough. Its value is estimated at £.90,000.

We understand that the office of Dean of the Arches, vacant by the death of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, has been conferred on Sir John Dodson, Queen's Advocate. Dr. Twiss has been nominated Queen's Advocate.

On Tuesday extensive fires were in many parts of London, caused chiefly by the wind blowing fresh during the last two days from the eastward. Most of the cellars in the lower parts of Wapping, Rotherhithe, and Backside were completely inundated, and considerable damage was done to property belonging to the poor people residing in the cellars. At five o'clock the steamer had some difficulty in passing under the bridges, especially the side arches of Westminster and Blackfriars.

The electric telegraph is now in operation between London and Bath, and in about a week it will be finished to Bristol, when operations will be immediately commenced to carry it on to Exeter, thereby connecting London and Plymouth.

There are seven French emigrants now residing at Jersey, victims of the coup d'état of M. Bonaparte. One of them is a notary's clerk by profession, three are commercial men, the other three are an architect, an advocate, and a surgeon. They are all from the department of the Sarthe.

Dr. Murray, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, was on Monday night suddenly struck with paralysis, from which there is little chance of his recovery, as his venerable prelate has attained the patriarchal age of 83. He had presided at the religious services over the remains of the late Mr. Shell, in the Jesuits' Church, and appeared in his usual health.

The Princess Naraki, grand-daughter of the Emperor Nicholas of Russia, and niece of the late Grand Duchess, on Tuesday week, accompanied by the Lady Superior of the order of St. Vincent de Paul, the object of her visit being to become a member of the Sisters of Providence. During a journey to Paris, after the death of her father, she adjured the Russian Greek faith, and became a Catholic. The Princess was edified by the exemplary life of the sisters of the congregation of St. Vincent de Paul, and she has resolved to finish her life among them.

Her Majesty's steamer Sprightly arrived at Kingstown harbour on Saturday evening with the remains of the late R. L. Shell. About midnight they were conveyed in a hearse to Dublin, and placed in the Jesuits' chapel in Upper Gardiner-street. On Monday a solemn office of high mass was celebrated over the remains by Archbishop Murray and several other Roman Catholic dignitaries.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

COLONIAL BISHOPS.—Mr. Gladstone has just brought in a bill to relieve bishops in the colonies in connection with the Established Church, and the clergy and laity in communion with them, from legal oaths and disabilities affecting the appointment of their church affairs. The bill provides that bishops in the Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Prince Edward's Island, the Cape of Good Hope, New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Van Diemen's Land, and Western Australia, may meet together from time to time to make all such regulations as may be held necessary for the better conduct of their ecclesiastical affairs, but they are not in any case to impose temporal penalties.

APPOINTMENTS AND PREFERMENTS.—The following appointments and preferments have been made:—Rectories: The Rev. J. T. Bayabam, to the rectory of Charlton, Dover; the Rev. George Valles Garland, to the rectory of Langton-Matravers, Dorset. Vicarages: The Rev. John P. Lingham, to the vicarage of Margate; the Rev. Wilmot Walker, to the vicarage of Bardney, Lincolnshire; the Rev. Harry Dupuis, to the vicarage of Kingston-upon-Thames, with Richmond, Surrey; the Rev. John Charles Frederick Vincent, to the head-mastership of Norwich Grammar School.

TESTIMONIALS.—The following clergymen have recently received testimonials of esteem and regard:—The Rev. John Palmer Jermain, perpetual curate of Bode, Cheshire, from his pupils; the Rev. E. H. Browne, the late very excellent and able vice-principal of St. David's College, Lampeter, from pupils and friends; the Rev. J. A. Page, incumbent, from the congregation of Tintwistle church; the Rev. William Slade, from his rector, parishioners, and friends, upon leaving the curacy of Cottesmore and Barrow; the Rev. Thomas Douglas, B.A., curate of St. Peter's Church, Ashton-under-Lyne, a gold watch, &c., together with a purse of 40 guineas, as a token of esteem and regard of the congregation.

THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.—RIVER FRONT.

THE New Palace of Parliament, at Westminster, has been described as "one of the most magnificent buildings ever erected continuously in Europe," and as "probably the largest Gothic edifice in the world." The entire plan covers at least twice the site of the old Palace of Westminster, about half the ground occupied being taken from the river. The extent and nobleness of the East or River Front, which may be considered its principal, is shown in the accompanying Illustration, which includes the elaborate façade, 900 feet in length, divided into five principal compartments, paneled with tracery, and decorated with rows of statues and shields of arms of the Kings and Queens of England from the Conqueror to the present time. The Victoria and Land Front will, it is expected, surpass in picturesqueness either of the others: it will be of the same length as the River Front, but from the nature of the ground not in an uninterrupted line. The View before us, therefore, characterises pictorially the vast extent of the Palace, which covers an area of nearly nine acres. Still, the actual greatness of the work can only be appreciated by "a careful examination of it part by part, an ascent of scaffoldings, inspection of the means in operation, and comparison with finished buildings."

The style and character of the structure—reminding us of the townhalls of the Low Countries, at Ypres, Ghent, Louvain, and Brussels are well shown in the River Front. The stone employed for the external masonry is a magnesian limestone from Anston, in Yorkshire; closegrained, of a texture considerably harder than Portland, and coloured warmer in colour. The River Terrace is of Aberdeen granite. The foundation of the building was commenced in 1839, by Messrs. Lea, of Chaswell-street. Messrs. Grissell and Peto undertook the first contract for the superstructure of the New Houses in 1840. It comprised the range of buildings fronting the river, with the returns next Westminsterbridge, and at the south end towards Abingdon-street. This building includes the residence for the Speaker, at the north end; the corresponding residential towards the south being the residence for the Lieutenant of the Black Rod. Between the two extremes, and comprising what are called the curtain portions, are the Libraries for the House of Peers (engraved in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for February 7), and the Libraries for the House of Commons; with intermediate centre are the Conference-room for the two Houses, Committee-rooms, &c. All this is on the principal floor, which is some 15 feet above the Terrace, or high-water mark. The whole of the floor above the Libraries, and looking over the river, is appropriated to Committee-rooms for the purposes of Parliament; the Peers occupying about one-third towards the south, and the Commons two-thirds towards the north. The House of Peers and House of Commons are situated in the rear of the front building, or that next the river, in the centre of the northern and southern halves of the plan, and are surrounded by courts and parliamentary offices. Their position will, however, be better understood by reference to the large plan published in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, No. 74.

The Eastern View of the River Front, selected by our Artist, is impressive and picturesque in effect, more especially in the upper portion, where the moon lights up the pointed roofs and pinacled towers; whilst the range of gas-lights upon the Terrace illumines the lower details of the building, the grandeur of the exterior, and the complicatedness of the interior arrangements, are a happy exemplification of the old system of building "things useful in a beautiful form."

MEETING OF THE FAMILY COLONISATION LOAN SOCIETY.

OUR Engraving represents a great meeting of this society, which took place on the 18th instant, in the British Institution, Tabernacle-row, City-road. More than 2500 persons were present; every corner, every rafter that could be reached was crowded, and the great hall, viewed from the platform, presented an undulating sea of faces, all deeply intent on the business of the evening. The flags of all nations ornamented the bare walls. At the end of the room, opposite the chairman, in huge letters, the mottoes "Advance Australia," "Speed the Plough," and an initial monagram of F. C. L. S. on the blue flag of the ship about to sail, were displayed. The Earl of Shaftesbury, who took the chair, had Mrs. Chisholm on his right hand, and on his left the Right Hon. Sidney and Mrs Herbert, with a party of their friends; Messrs. Gone, William Jackson, James Levick, M'Clellan, and others engaged in the Australian trade; and Messrs. Stanley Carr, S. Devonport, M'Nab, Churnside, Russell, and other Australian colonists were among the parties who crowded the platform.

The Earl of Shaftesbury, in opening the business of the meeting, pointed out the advantages of this system of emigration, by which families were transplanted in their entirety. "He had seen in the last ship in which he included a child six weeks old, and a grandmother who had attained eighty-four years." He passed a high eulogy on the talents and self-denial of Mrs. Chisholm, saying, "The children shall arise, and call her blessed."

Mr. Samuel Sidney (in the absence of the honorary secretary, Captain Chisholm, who was at Port Phillip, engaged, at his own expense, in carrying out Mrs. Chisholm's philanthropic plans) gave a detailed account of the origin, progress, and results of the society, of which the following is an abstract:—The society was projected by Mrs. Chisholm in 1847, on her return from Australia, after successfully working at colonisation for seven years. By the end of 1849 she had collected some two hundred parties, who, by small instalments, had paid nearly two-thirds of their passage-money. In 1850 she procured the patronage of her first committee, including the noble chairman, Mr. Sidney Herbert, Mr. Vernon Smith, Mr. Wyndham Harding, and Mr. Tidd Pratt. A small sum of money was subscribed, towards which the Countess of Pembroke gave £250. The society then brought before the public in May, 1850; and in September, 1850, the first ship, the Slains Castle, was despatched with 189 statute emigrants, or about 250 men, women, and children. Towards their passages the emigrants paid, by instalments, £1400. The society has since, by repaid the money by earnings in the colony. Mr. Sidney Herbert, in his speech, announced that he had already received part of this debt. The second ship, the Blundell, sailed in May, 1851, with 218 adult emigrants, who paid £1942, and borrowed £674 from the society. The third ship, the Athenian, sailed in September, 1851, with 209 emigrants, who paid £1942, and borrowed £924. Thus, in twelve months, during a period that the Government had been unable to fill several of their ships with emigrants to whom they gave a free passage, and when filled half only one ship to obtain a class whom Earl Grey termed the refuse of workhouses, inferior to convicts. Mrs. Chisholm had been able to collect families of the most industrious and frugal class, numbering one thousand souls, and contributing £5287. Since despatching the Athenian, £2100 more had been paid in by the working classes for the same purpose, and the Mariner was about to sail with a full cargo of passengers, who had contributed a greater proportion toward their passage than their predecessors. All this had been done without the usual expensive machinery of colonising companies. Mrs. Chisholm and her family gave up their time gratuitously to the work, with the aid of one clerk, and one old woman to open the door to the enquirers who knocked from morning to night. She had received eighty letters and forty calls on the subject of emigration in one day. Mrs. Chisholm's success was owing not less to her common sense, her business-like habits and experience, than to her energetic philanthropy. Her plan was extremely simple. Every Monday evening she held meetings of intending emigrants at her small house, No. 3, Charlton Crescent, Islington, where they obtained information, and made acquaintance with each other. Groups were formed of from three to eight families, who co-operated for mutual assistance on the voyage. These groups each elected a representative, and these formed committees for a variety of useful objects on board. Instalments were taken as low as one shilling a week. When a sufficient number had paid up to justify the society in taking a ship, an economy was effected in the passage-money, while the best provisions, good ventilation, enclosed berths, and superior arrangement for the decent comfort of families and the protection of single girls and friendless children were secured. Every ship was an improvement on the preceding one; and the society aimed not only at assisting as many emigrants as possible, but at affording an example of model emigration. The success of the society was founded on the eleven years' experience of Mrs. Chisholm, of which he gave a rapid sketch.

In acknowledging a vote of thanks which was moved by Captain Carr, of Port Phillip, and Samuel Devonport, of South Australia, Mr. Sidney Herbert stated that already all the theoretical objections to the working of the Society had proved unfounded. He had that morning received by post remittances on account of the loan to the emigrants by the Stanis Castle. The accession of the Australian city merchants to the committee would, by additional funds, largely increase the usefulness of the society.

With a vote of thanks to Lord Shaftesbury, and three cheers for Mrs. Chisholm, one of the most numerous and enthusiastic meetings on the subject of emigration ever held in the country separated.

The street was crowded with parties unable to obtain admission. About £4000 has been subscribed this week, to be advanced in loans to intending emigrants. Three ladies, who conceal their names, subscribed £300.

PROCESSION OF LE BŒUF GRAS IN PARIS.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

THE LAST DAY'S HUNT OF THE SEASON AT CHANTILLY.

On the 14th inst. closed the hunting season at Chantilly, and perhaps closed it for ever. The decree of the President of the Republic renders it imperative that this princely domain, the Melton of France, should be sold within a year; and as no one in France would purchase the entire property, when legal notice already given would render the title problematical, it is not improbable that it may be parcelled out and sold to those desperate speculators who would risk but little to obtain much.

There is no man conversant with French history who has not heard or read of Chantilly. Our own countryman, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, resided at Chantilly when that property belonged to the Constable of France, Montmorency.

"The brave Constable," says Lord Herbert, "testifying his regard for me, said he left his fair house at Chantilly to be commanded by me, as well as his forests and chases, well stored with wild boar and stag, and that I might hunt them when I pleased." And fair house it must have been, for it is described by the learned Lord as a great strong castle, joined together with bridges, and sumptuously furnished with hangings of silk and gold, rare pictures, statues, &c. And how much this house, together with the forest, has been valued by Princes, is evident from the fact that Charles V., the great Emperor, passing in the time of Francis I. from Spain into the Low Countries, was entertained by the Duke of Montmorency at Chantilly; and, after examining its beauties, he said, "I would willingly give one of my provinces in the Low Countries for such a place." Henry IV. of France was so desirous of this domain that he offered to exchange any of his houses, with much more land than the estate was worth, to obtain it.

The grand Condé, by marriage with the heiress of Montmorency, became the possessor of this splendid property. He was a great sportsman, as was the Duke of Bourbon, the last of that illustrious race, who kept three packs of hounds, and was the Nimrod of France. The melancholy fate of his heir, the Duc d'Enghien, basely seized on neutral ground, and shot by torch-light in the ditch of Vincennes, needs no comment here. The Duke de Bourbon dying childless left Chantilly to the Duke d'Aumale, who like his predecessors encouraged the sports of the chase until the revolution of 1848; being forced to take shelter in England, he gave permission to the Count d'Hedouville to hunt his forests, which that nobleman has continued to do with a subscription pack of hounds, on the English plan, showing admirable sport to a numerous field of sportsmen, who were as much charmed by his urbanity of manner as delighted by the recreation itself. The last day's run, was a most remarkable one, having killed a noble stag after a run of three hours and a half.

No more, perhaps, will the merry horn of the huntsman resound through the woods of Chantilly. The dull heavy blow of the axe, the leveller of the forest, may drive the stag from its retreat, and the fox from its lair; nay, even the plough may pass over the verdant lawn, the romantic race-course, and even the place where the château now stands thus obliterating for ever the remembrance of one of the most beautiful properties of France, where Emperors, Kings, and the highest dignitaries of the State have resided; and where the noble sport of hunting was maintained by every possessor even to the 14th of February, 1852.

PROCESSION OF THE BŒUF GRAS IN PARIS.

THE procession of the "fat ox," which has from time immemorial closed the pleasures of the Carnival, with its feasting, masking, and dancing, in Paris, was, up to the matter-of-fact days of the Revolution of 1848, the conundrum of the butchers of the French metropolis to the galeties of the season; but since that lamentable epoch the butchers have grown grave, and abstained from all such childish memories; and the time honoured procession of the emblem of good cheer might have passed for ever away, with the many other happy usages of the olden time which have ceased to be, if it were not that the professional caterers for public amusement have found their account in gratifying the popular taste in the matter; and, accordingly, the proprietors of the Hippodrome "organised" (as the modern phrase has it) a cortège carnivalesque, which proceeded through the principal thoroughfares of Paris on Sunday, and again on Shrove Tuesday. The car, whose peculiar dimensions obtained for him the honour of figuring the most conspicuous character on the occasion, was selected from amongst eleven others, and bore the classic name of Marius. On Sunday morning, at ten o'clock, the cortège issued from the Hippodrome in presence of an admiring and crowded attendance. The cortège was opened with the fanfares of trumpets; then came the Car of Industry, drawn by six white horses, and led by an allegorical personage representing France, and having at his side two persons, also allegorical, representing the arts and sciences. Behind the car banners were borne by operatives, who had volunteered for the duty. A band of military music preceded the Car of Agriculture, drawn by two oxen with gilded horns, and containing the Goddess that presides over the harvests, accompanied by her mythological cortège, and followed by banners borne by persons representing the various branches of the agricultural art. What principally attracted attention was a parterre of flowers containing the products of agriculture, and which to the spectator appeared to move of itself, but was in reality borne by four men who were concealed by drapery hanging to the ground. The animal himself destined to be the great ornament and the victim of the fête, was very fair to look upon. He moved along with much majesty; he was a fine specimen of his kind—large, round, and well proportioned. The cortège proceed at the Elysée, the English Embassy, the Russian Embassy, the Foreign Office, and the hotels of the other Ministers, the Prefecture, and other public establishments, to receive the usual gratifications; and, having passed through the entire length of the Boulevards to the Bœuf gras ceased the night at the Arbre, Rue de Lyon, where he remained till Tuesday; when, after a second promenade, he was transferred to the abattoir, and his career terminated.

FOREIGN REFUGEES IN ENGLAND, AND ENGLISH TRAVELLERS ON THE CONTINENT.

Within the last week or two it has been generally rumoured, that, in consequence of the British Government not exercising over the foreign political refugees now in London as strict a surveillance as the Austrian Government thought requisite, Prince Schwartzenburg had addressed a despatch to the Austrian Minister Plenipotentiary in London, Count Budi-Schaunenstein, threatening British travellers through the Austrian dominions with vexatious and annoying proceedings relative to passports and the like.

The rumour has proved to be correct, as may be seen from the despatch itself, which has been published this week. It is as follows:—

Vienna, Feb 4, 1852.

Lord Granville has had the goodness to communicate to your Excellency the despatch which he addressed to the Earl of Westmoreland, under date of the 18th of January last, in answer to the protests (reclamations) which you, M. le Comte, were charged to present to the Government of her Britannic Majesty against the tolerance accorded in England to the revolutionary proceedings (menées révolutionnaires) of the political refugees who have found an asylum in that country.

The first part of this document (Lord Granville's despatch) turns on the high value which the English people attach to the right of asylum, and on the motives which hinder the British Government from thinking of (songer à) restraining that right, by presenting an alien bill to Parliament.

We do not feel ourselves called upon to enter upon a controversy on the arguments employed in this part of the despatch of Lord Granville, since we have never denied to England the exercise of the right of asylum in itself. Many more than we have pretended to dictate to the British Government, which itself is the most competent judge, the means which it should employ to obviate the flagrant abuse of this right.

All that we have demanded of the British Government (and we shall not cease to demand it) is, that it shall so manage (fasse en sorte) that the political refugees to whom it accords an asylum shall not be allowed to pursue, under the shadow of the hospitality they enjoy, machinations openly hostile to the States of the Continent, and especially to Austria

Lord Granville has been so good (a bien voulu) as to offer us, on this subject, an assurance that the British Government would not only (ne pourrait que) disapprove, loudly condemn, all attempts on the part of the refugees to excite insurrection in their original country; that it would continue to watch (surveiller) the conduct of suspected refugees, and would seek by all legal means to hinder them from abusing—to the detriment of Governments in friendly alliance with Great Britain—the hospitality which the English laws so generously accord to them.

The Emperor, in noting these (ces personnes sont) these assurances, the pleasure in thence deriving a hope (aume à puiser l'espoir) that the British Government will henceforth know how to make more ample and rigorous use than it has hitherto done of the legal means at its disposal, and which it deems to judge sufficient to enable it to fulfil its international duties with regard to the proceedings of the refugees.

At any rate (toutefois), while waiting till these dispositions of the British Government are followed by deeds (soient suivies d'effet), the almost unlimited liberty of action which the refugees have hitherto enjoyed in England, with regard to the revolutionary plots that a great number of them do not cease hatching against the repose of the States of the Continent, imposes upon us, on our side, the duty of taking some measures of precaution tending to guard us against the annoyances (inconvénients) and dangers of which that liberty is the source.

The Imperial authorities will henceforth receive orders to "redouble" their vigilance with regard to travellers coming from England and to exercise strictly in relation to their passports the existing rules to which formerly, under the empire of other circumstances, it had become a habit to make frequent exceptions in favour of British subjects. The Imperial Government, moreover, reserves to itself the faculty of taking into consideration ulterior measures, if unhappily the need of them still makes itself felt.

Your Excellency is charged to read and give a copy of this despatch to Lord Granville. Receive, &c.

The Belgian Chamber, at the request of the Ministers, has forbidden the stenographic writers who report the debates, and are paid by the state, to take part in the conduct or publication of any political periodical. On this occasion of this regulation is the discovery made on the seizure of the Bulletin Français, that one of the Government reporters had co-operated in the preparation of that work.

The Brussels journals announce the death of Count Julien de Bocarmé, the uncle of the Count de Bocarmé who was recently executed for poisoning his brother-in-law. It will be remembered that, in consequence of this affair, Count Julien had resigned his seat in the Belgian Senate, but was re-elected almost unanimously.

We read in the Prussian Gazette of the 21st:—"The French Government has remonstrated against the decision regulating the navigation duties on the Rhine without consulting France. The Prussian Cabinet has replied that it was free to France to take part in the negotiations, but that there was no treaty that gave her the right to interfere in the commercial arrangements of Germany."

The Roman Government have sanctioned the introduction of postage stamps for the pre-payment of postage on letters. The stamp is about the size of the English postage stamp; and on it is a representation of the tiara and keys, the badge of papal dignity and power

The Jews of Paris, headed by MM. d Rothschild, and other prominent members of the sect, have just established a school for the study and propagation of the sacred sciences. Rooms have been taken in which religious instruction is given gratuitously to young men destined for the priesthood. A rabbi is attached to the establishment; and every Sunday M. Albert Cohn, a distinguished Oriental scholar, reads and explains passages from the Fathers of the Synagogue.

By a letter from Aden, dated the 24th of January, it appears that a few days previously a French brig, laden with sugar, left that port, having on board 130 Coolies, to be conveyed to Bourbon (Réunion). The vessel had not got far on her voyage when the Coolies murdered the captain and officers, ran the ship ashore, and escaped. The Governor of Aden had immediately informed the East India Company, which had just come into Aden, was preparing to go in pursuit of the murderers and to secure the brig.

Accounts from St. John's, Newfoundland, state that the herring fishery had proved a complete failure, owing to the cold weather.

The Belgian Government has authorised an English company to lay down an electric telegraph between Ostend and London.

Sir J. Paxton's designs for the New York Crystal Palace are seen in many of the public rooms of the city of New York, and much admired. Upwards of 50 000 dols were raised on the 8th inst., among a few gentlemen, towards the erection of the structure.

It is said that the Earl of Shrewsbury has intimated his readine s to bestow the sum of £10,000 for the purpose of building and endowing a cathedral in Chester, for the purpose of worship according to the forms and ritual of the Roman Catholic Church. It is added, that his Lordship intends to appropriate a similar sum for the same object in Shrewsbury.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

Their Lordships met at five o'clock, in numbers somewhat more fully than usual, in consequence of the expected explanation of Ministers.

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATION.

Shortly after five o'clock the Marquis of LANSDOWNE entered the House, and immediately proceeded to say that he was about to move that the order of the day which stood for this following Friday, for the appointment of a committee on the East India question, be discharged. Their Lordships must readily imagine the grounds of such a motion, as the circumstances connected with them were already known to them all namely, that all her Majesty's present Ministers only held their several offices until their successors were appointed. In making this announcement he was most anxious to avoid the utterances of anything calculated to excite differences of opinion, or even to provoke any sort of discussion. He wished to abstain from taking such a course for various reasons, but especially in consequence of the absence of a noble Earl, a much valued friend of his, although a political opponent. He had heard from that noble Lord, within the last hour, that he had accepted the office of First Minister of the Crown, and that he was now engaged in forming another administration as soon as possible. Though it would be impossible for him (the Marquis of Lansdowne) to afford him any assistance in, yet in which he should be the very last man to create—were it even in his power to create—the slightest shadow of embarrassment. He believed that there were concessions in this country many anonymous Administrations ready to undertake the duty of conducting her Majesty's affairs, but only wanted a little encouragement to make themselves known. He had only to say that he was lamented by persons of opinion, and every hour that had passed during the last year had confirmed him in that opinion, that the retention of office by a Government which did not obtain that amount of support necessary to enable it to act with efficiency in the administration of the affairs of this country was most unwise, for it not only ceased to be useful, but actually became productive of evil to the country. When the noble Lord at the head of the Government informed him on Saturday morning that he was disposed to resign into her Majesty's hands the trust confided to him, he (the noble Marquis) gave him his entire approbation in the course he had adopted to come to that resolution. He hoped he might be forgiven considering the position in which he stood, and considering in what improbable that he would ever again be placed from that epoch—if reference to another subject. As long as he had life and health it would be considered by him a part of his duty to attend to the proceedings of this House, and to take part in the various important questions that might come before it. He also, like those of a similar character, and which he was afraid would long cont nue eventful. The time, however, had arrived when he thought he might be reasonably relieved from what he might call a compulsory attendance in that House. With that feeling he would not sit down without thanking all his noble friends he saw around him, both personal and political, for the warmth and cordiality of that support which he had constantly received from them. He must also say, he felt deeply grateful to the noble Lords opposite for the invariable kindness, courtesy, and forbearance which they had shown to him. He had now only to propose, that the House, on its rising, do adjourn to Friday. He made that motion after having had a communication with the noble Earl to whom he had just referred.

The Earl of MALMESBURY said it would be unbecoming in him to make any remarks in reply to what had fallen from the noble Marquis. He, however, hoped he might be permitted to say that those with whom he was connected felt much pride and pleasure at the manner in which the noble Marquis alluded to them on the occasion of his resignation, and which he was afraid would long be a political battle of the country. He could, on their part, with the most perfect truth, reciprocate the observation when referring to the bearing of the noble Marquis and his colleagues at this unusual side of the House. He trusted that the words spoken by the noble Marquis would long be remembered by them, coming as they did from the very highest authority, and from a nobleman characterised also say, he felt deeply grateful to the noble Lords opposite for the invariable by both by great experience, dignity of bearing, and courtesy of manner. His had no long more to say than to express his sincere hope that the noble Marquis might be able for many a year to come to occupy his seat in that House, which he had ever filled with dignity and honour, and he might almost say without a peer in his value and important assistance in their proceedings; and that he might long be spared to give them his advice, and the value of the example of those virtues which have already adorned his many years of public assembly.

The motion was then agreed to, with the understanding that their Lordships might meet from day to day to dispose of private business, if they should deem fit.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at four o'clock, when there was a very full House.

Attracted at that early hour by the expected Ministerial explanation. About half past four o'clock Mr. Disraeli entered and took his seat in his usual place, on the front or leading Opposition bench. Sir F. Baring and Sir G. Grey immediately followed, and for a few minutes Lord John Russell, in like manner, took their seats on the Treasury bench, beside Mr. Hayter, Mr. C. Lewis, and some other of the subordinates of the outgoing Government, who had been present from the first. Lord Palmerston, who soon after entered, at an hour later, occupied a seat on the lower front bench below the gangway, on the Ministerial side of the House.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr HEARD took the oaths and his seat, on his election for the borough of Kinsale, in the room of Mr. Hawes. The hon. member was introduced by Colonel Dunne and Mr. Biggins

Several private bills were then very speedily "disposed of,"

On the order of the day for the second reading of the SOUTH YORKSHIRE RAILWAY AND RIVER DUN COMPANY BILL.

Lord GALWAY opposed the second reading, which he said the House had rejected on more than one occasion previously. The bill was a measure promoted by the Great Northern Company, who, having failed when it was brought forward in their own name, now substituted that of South Yorkshire. It was opposed as the second reading was moved for six months.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER supported the bill, which he denied was a Great Northern scheme. The object was to enable the South Yorkshire Company to connect their line with that part of the river Don which was navigable, and the river Trent. Every landowner but one, and he was the agent of the noble Lord who last spoke, was in favour of the line.

After considerable discussion, carried on amidst the loudly-expressed impatience of the House, a division took place, when there appeared—For the second reading, 113; against it, 222: majority, 109. The bill was accordingly lost.

NOTICES OF MOTION. MAYNOOTH.

Mr. SPOONER said that as it was impossible now that the motion which stood in his name relative to the Colleges of Maynooth could come on upon the day originally fixed for it, and as several of the Irish members had asked him to postpone it, he begged to be allowed to postpone it accordingly to an early day after Easter. (Cheers from the Ministerial benches.)

CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE.

Mr. HUME asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether, after the promises made in the last session to inquire up, steps had been taken for bringing the obelisk known under the name of Cleopatra's Needle, and which had been presented to George IV. by the late Mohammed Ali, Pacha of Egypt, to England?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that in the course of last year inquiries had been set on foot with the view of ascertaining whether the value of the obelisk was worth the expense of its removal, and that no decision had yet been come to on the matter.

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATION.

Lord J. RUSSELL here rose, and amidst the breathless attention of the House said:—Sir, after the majority of last Friday night, the House will be prepared for the announcement which I now make. At a meeting of her Majesty's servants on Saturday, we considered what course it was incumbent upon us to pursue. It appeared to us that it was impossible, with any degree satisfactorily the business of the Government in this House, after the event of the preceding night. We considered the alternative of advising her Majesty to make use of her prerogative of dissolution, but we considered there were such grave objections to such a course, that we declined recommending it to the Crown. We therefore determined humbly to lay our resignation before her Majesty, which I accordingly did the same afternoon. Her Majesty was graciously pleased to accept our resignation, and has since sent for the Earl of Derby, who I understand has undertaken the task of forming a Government. We therefore hold our offices only until our successors are appointed by her Majesty. Sir, after this statement, I have no wish to recur to the various events which have taken place since the commencement of this session, and which may form, perhaps, a fitting topic for discussion hereafter. Circumstances which I have to say on this occasion without expressing my sincere thanks to those who have supported her Majesty's Government, and who during upwards of five years have enabled me to support the burden to which, I must confess, I was otherwise totally unequal. (Hear hear.) Having their confidence, and having had the advantage of their support, I have been enabled during that period so to conduct affairs that we shall not leave any branch of our domestic and foreign policy in a situation of which we need be at all ashamed. (Ministerial cheers.) I wish further to say with respect to one of my colleagues, to whom I am peculiarly indebted, that it is to his temperate wisdom and respected character we are indebted that we owe the facilities of passing safely to carry measures of great importance through the House of Lords, where a Ministry composed of the party to which I belong has not hitherto had the support of a majority. As I said, I do not wish to oppose out of office, as I have opposed in office, any resistance of the duty on corn—(Ministerial cheers)—whether under the name of protection or of revenue—(Renewed cheers) that I shall think it my duty to support an extension of the suffrage—(Ministerial cheers)—to those who are entitled to exercise the franchises for the welfare of the country, believing that such extension will add to the strength and solidity of our Parliamentary system. (Hear, hear.) I will say further, that I shall use the little influence I may possess for the maintenance of the blessings of peace. (Hear, hear.) I have only further to say, that since I came to the House I have had a communication from the Earl of Derby, stating that it is his wish, for the convenience of the official arrangements which he has been charged to make by her Majesty, that the House will adjourn to Friday next. In compliance with that wish, and for the promotion of the public convenience, I therefore move that the House at its rising adjourn to Friday next.

Mr. HUME said, that the course proposed by the noble Lord was the usual one on such occasions, and he rose simply to express a hope that the House, when it met on Friday, would have an opportunity of receiving from the new Ministers explanations of the policy they intended to pursue. (Laughter from the Opposition.) He said so, for he had heard a rumour that the House would not meet again. He could not think that any such advantage would be taken on the part of those who were called to the administration of affairs, but that they would come forward and fairly state what their policy was. He was independent of both parties, and if they brought in good measures he would support them—(Laughter)—and if they brought in bad ones he would oppose them. He belonged to no party, but was the steady advocate of all truly liberal measures, and of carrying out Free Trade beyond the extent to which it at present went. If they wanted to restore the system of protection, let them Let the manliness to state it, but let them not go to the country without having declared their intentions.

The motion was agreed to; and at twenty-five minutes to six o'clock the House rose, and adjourned to Friday.

THE LOCAL MILITIA BILL.

The following is the list of the division in the House of Commons, on Friday night week, the result of which put an end to the Russell Administration.

Resolution reported, "That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the LAWS respecting the Local Militia."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Laws respecting the Local Militia" (Mr. Bernal).

Amendment proposed to be made to the Question, by inserting after the word "amend" the words "and consolidate" (Viscount Palmerston). Question, "That the words 'and consolidate' be there inserted," put and agreed to. Another amendment proposed to be made to the Question, by leaving out the word "local" (Viscount Palmerston). Question put, "That the word 'local' stand part of the Question." The House divided Ayes, 126; Noes, 136.

LORD NAAS'S MOTION.

Lord Elbington, against Lord Naas's motion, from 7 till half-past 10 on Thursday night.

THE PROTECTIONISTS IN POWER AND THE CORN-LAW AGITATION.

The creation of a Protectionist Cabinet has put the leading members of the Anti-Corn Law League on the alert. On Tuesday evening they held a meeting at Newhall's-buildings, in Manchester, to consider whether the League should be renewed in consequence of Lord Derby having come into power, pledged on the first night of the session to restore Protection. Mr. George Wilson was in the chair.

One hundred and eight gentlemen were present, who declared themselves ready to sacrifice their time and money as before, if necessary; but it was thought sufficient for the present to empower the Executive Council of the League to watch the proceedings of the Administration, awaiting their formal declaration of policy, and to adjourn to Tuesday next.

In the course of the proceedings it was repeatedly declared, amidst much cheering, that if the League were once reassociated, its operations would never be suspended until the permanency of Free Trade had been thoroughly established: that more money, more time, and greater efforts would be devoted to this great purpose than had been given to support the Free-trade movement prior to 1846; and that, before embarking on the wild enterprise of restoring monopoly, Lord Derby would do well to consider its effects upon the position and interests of his order.

By the returns ordered by the House of Commons, on the motion of Lord Naas, of the detections, prosecutions, and convictions, under the laws for the suppression of illicit distillation, for the year ending the 5th of April, 1851, it appears that in Ireland the number of detections amounted to 3515, of prosecutions 1924, of convictions to 984. In England the convictions were 493, the prosecutions 476, the convictions 436. In Scotland the detections were 158, prosecutions 39, convictions 29. The number of stills seized and destroyed in Ireland was 620, in England 323, in Scotland 44.

It appears by a Parliamentary paper, that 817 friendly societies in England and Wales were certified or registered under the provisions of the act relating to friendly societies of last session. Of these, 771 were English societies, and 46 were established in Wales.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

IN RE JAMES ANDERSON, FORMERLY OF DRURY-LANE THEATRE, AN INSOLVENT.—In this case Mr. Charles Druce, the registrar, has made his report, and the dividend under the insolvency occasioned by Drury-lane Theatre will be "twopence three farthings" in the pound on debts proved to £3318. The money in court on which the dividend will be declared, and of which the creditors will have notice, is £222 4s. 1d. The matter had been several times before the registrar, and a discussion arose in respect to the sum on which a dividend was to be paid for the play called "The Old Love and the New." The registrar fixed the dividend on the amount claimed by the author.

In the case of Bogue v. Houlston, an injunction had been applied for in the Vice-Chancellor Parker's Court, to restrain the defendants, Messrs. Houlston and Stoneman, the booksellers and publishers, from publishing a book entitled "Story Books for Young People by Aunt Mary. The comical History and tragical End of Reynard the Fox," published by the defendants, or any other work copied or colourably altered from any part of a book published by the plaintiff entitled "The Comical Creatures from Wurtemburg, including the Story of Reynard the Fox, with twenty-four Illustrations drawn from life, or stuffed animals contributed by Herrman Plonequet, of Stuttgart, at the Great Exhibition," wherein copyright existed. The facts of the case appeared in the last Number of our paper.

On Monday before the Vice-Chancellor pronounced judgment. He said, upon an inspection of the designs, he had already come to the conclusion that the defendants had copied the illustrations and the names at the foot of each from those of the plaintiff's work, but it had been suggested, on behalf of the defendants, that the plaintiff had no title to the copyright in these illustrations, because he had not caused his name and the date of publication to be truly engraved at the foot of each print, according to the regulations of the 8 Geo. 2, c. 13. The interpretation clause of the 5th and 6th Vic c 45, declared that the word "book" should mean "every volume, part, or division of a volume, pamphlet, sheet of letterpress, sheet of music, map, chart, or plan, separately published." Doubtless, these words did not include prints or designs separately published; but when they formed part of a book, although the book included letterpress, the statute stated in the registered proprietor of the book the right to restrain any infringement of the copyright of the whole, including the designs, a though prints published separately might not be within the act of Victoria. The obvious construction of the act of 5 and 6 Vic., c. 45, appeared to him to be that where designs formed part of a book in which copyright existed, it extended to the designs as well as the letterpress. The court, therefore, must grant an injunction as the plaintiff asked, he, however, bringing an action if the defendants should require it.

In the Court of Exchequer, on Tuesday, an action was tried before the Lord Chief Baron and a common jury at Guildhall, in which a Miss Rowland was the plaintiff, and Mr. Charles Matthews, the comedian and manager of the Lyceum Theatre, was the defendant. The plaintiff brought the action to recover the value of certain articles of dress supplied, and of the services rendered by her as mistress of the wardrobe, and dresser at the defendant's theatre (having been first engaged at the Lyceum in 1848). On the 19th of July she received a note from the defendant, formally discharging her, and her salary, of £4 a week, was paid up to the following Saturday. She, however, continued in the present action £28, for seven weeks' wages from the time of her dismissal, on the ground that her engagement was not a weekly one, but for the season. For the defendant it was contended that the plaintiff could not recover seven weeks' wages as for work done since it had not been done. The form of action should have been for a wrongful dismissal. It was ultimately agreed that a juror should be withdrawn, the effect of which is that the action is at an end, and that each party pays its own costs.

THE LAW OF ARREST.—IMPORTANT DECISION.—An application was made on Tuesday to Mr. Commissioner Perry, at the Liverpool Bankruptcy Court, to discharge a Mr. William Bullock from custody, on the ground that he had been arrested upon a Sunday upon the assumed authority of the Absconding Debtors Arrest Act recently passed. The commissioner decided that the Absconding Debtors Act did not repeal the provision of Charles II.; consequently, the prisoner must be discharged.

RELATIONS BETWEEN LAWYER AND CLIENT.—A meeting of the members of the Law Amendment Society was held on Monday night, at the society's rooms, 21, Regent-street. Lord Brougham occupied the chair. Mr. Crauford read the amended report of the special committee on the relation between the bar, the attorney, and the client, which submitted, as its conclusion, the following resolutions:—"1. That any practice which has a tendency to prevent the public from obtaining the assistance of counsel except through the compulsory intervention of an attorney should be discontinued. 2. That so much of the 91st section of the Act of 9 and 10 Vic., c. 95, as prevents a barrister from advocating the causes of suitors in the county courts, unless instructed by an attorney, should be repealed. 3. That attorneys should not be permitted to act as advocates in the superior courts. 4. That attorneys should be eligible to be called to the bar without any intermediate cessation from practice. 5. That counsel should be made responsible to their clients for causes negligenta, breach of contract, and breach of confidence. 6. That a new university, composed of the inns of court, and governed by an elected senate, should be established, and that such senate should have jurisdiction in all questions concerning the discipline and conduct of the bar. 7. That all candidates for admission to the degree of barrister should pass a public examination." Mr. M. D. Hill, Mr. Macqueen, Mr. Pulling, and several other gentlemen having addressed a meeting, the motion for the reception of the report was agreed to. Mr. Fitzroy, M.P. for Lewes, moved the second resolution appended to the report of the committee—namely, "That so much of the 91st section of the Act of 9 and 10 Vict., c. 95, as prevents a barrister from advocating the causes of suitors in the county courts, 'unless instructed by an attorney,' should be repealed." Lord Brougham remarked that he understood there was a very general cry at the bar in favour of the repeal. Mr. M. D. Hill seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.—Adjourned.

Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, who had occupied the bench for eighteen years. The office of Queen's Advocate is at present vacant.

RECTORSHIP OF MARISCHAL COLLEGE, ABERDEEN.—It was stated that, at a meeting of the students of Marischal College, Aberdeen, held on Saturday last, Viscount Palmerston was nominated to the Lord Rectorship of that University, among whom Lord Eglinton, the present Rector. How the election will go is as yet uncertain.

THE ASSESSORSHIP OF THE LIVERPOOL COURT OF PASSAGE.—The appointment of M. Edward James, in place of Mr. Crompton, now Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench—one of the last acts of Lord Truro as Chancellor—has, it is said, created general satisfaction in Liverpool.

The Memorial d'Amiens states that a sugar market is to be opened at Paris, at which the agents of the factories can transact business once a week.

A Royal decree has appeared in the official journal of Naples, declaring that from the time forth the Museo Borbonico, the Museo Farnesiano, the papyrus manuscripts of Herculaneum, the excavated relics of Pompeii, and other monuments of antiquity, cease to belong to the nation, and become, instead, the personal property of the Royal house.

The Queen has been pleased to direct that the honour of knighthood should be conferred upon Doctor Charles Nicholson, Speaker of the Legislative Council of South Wales.

Prince Louis Napoleon has just sent, through the embassy in London, to Mr. J. Laurie, of Hyde-park-place, a magnificent gold box, which bears the following inscription:—"Presented by Prince Louis Napoleon, President of France, to John Laurie, Esq., of Hyde-park-place, architect of the counties of Middlesex and Essex, as a remembrance of the very gracious gifts received by him which belonged to the Emperor Napoleon. 1852."

A commission of inquiry, comprising the Hon. R. S. Dundas, Captain Sherringham, of the Admiralty; Captain H. Nelson, one of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity; and Captain Beechey, of the Marine Department of the Board of Trade, was opened at the Admiralty on Friday week, for the purpose of receiving evidence and recommending to Parliament the most efficient and economical system of lighting all vessels afloat, whether at anchor or otherwise. Steamvessels will be included in the subject of investigation.

On the 7th of September, Bishop Dumo solemnly ordained a native, named Chi, to the order of deacon in the church at Shanghai. What rendered it more interesting was that Chi was the first convert whom the bishop had baptised. This is the first instance who has ever received holy orders in our communion.

In addition to the £1000 left to the Fistula Institution by the late Thomas Dickinson, Esq., of Upper Holloway, he had presented it with £3000 during his life.

On the 10th inst. two children of a labourer, named Middlemiss, of the respective ages of two and six years, were brought before William L. The children, the youngest of whom was carried in its mother's arms, were fined £1 each, and £1 6s. 10d. expenses, or, in default of payment, thirty days imprisonment! Lord Cowen has advised a bill of suspension in the Court of Justiciary against the judgment, and intimation of the same has been ordered.

CHESS IN RUSSIA.

The following game is one of a match, to consist of a great many parties, now pending between the elder of the two Princes Ourousoff and Mr. Bihn (or Dantzic), who is accounted the strongest player in the ancient capital of Moscow.

(Sicilian Opening)

WHITE (Prince O.)	BLACK (Mr. B.)	WHITE (Prince O.)	BLACK (Mr. B.)
1. P to K 4th	P to Q B 4th	10 P to K B 4th	P to K 4th
2. B to Q B 4th	Kt to Q B 3d	11. Castles	P to Q 3d

4. Kt to Q B 3d	K Kt to K 2d	13. R takes Kt (c)	P takes R
5. B to K B 4th (a)	P to Q R 3d (b)	14. K Kt to Q 6th	Q to K 3d (f)
6. K Kt to K 2d	P to Q Kt 4th (c)	15. B to Q Kt 6th	K to Q 2d
7. B takes Q Kt P	P takes B	16 K Kt takes K B P	Q to K B 3d
8. Q takes P	Kt to K Kt 3d	17. Q to K Kt 4th (ch)	K to K sq
9. B to Q B 7th (d)	Q to K B 3d	And White gave mate in three moves (g)

For the comments on this game we are indebted to the celebrated author of the "Nouvelle Analyse."

(a) The Allgé of White is very well combined

(b) We hold this preparatory move of P to Q R 3d, Black could never advance his Pawn to Q 4th (and, we may add, would be in great danger if the adverse Kt were played to Q Kt 5th.—Editor.)

(c) This, in our opinion, is the moment for throwing forward the Pawn to Q 4 h The move of P to Q Kt 4th only serves to sacrifice his Bishop advantageously

(d) The move of the Bishop and the escape which follow, are very clever. Player.

(e) The second sacrifice was equa ly se., calculated with the first

(f) Q to K R 3d appears to be better play

(g) The present game, though extremely well combined by the Prince, affords but an imperfect idea of the actual skill of Mr Bihn who is known as a master much To judge fully of their re ative strength, it will be necessary to see some oth r games of the match, which, being a long one, will afford a satisfactory test

The three days' sporting at Liverpool are fixed for Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday next; the first and third days being devoted to the lovers of the leash on the celebrated "pastes of Altcar, and the second to the steeple-chase and flat-racing. STAG HUNT.—On Monday Mr. Wood's hounds met at ten o'clock on Harson Down, near Swansea, when the stag was uncarted, and after a race of one hour and 30 minutes was taken uninjured, in a bay between Portreynon and Rosailly.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Morning Herald announces that "the shipowners of the empire are about to issue a manifesto, calling upon all individual members of that important interest to discard at the approaching general election all personal and party considerations, and to unite as one man in giving their support to those candidates only who will unequivocally pledge themselves to a calm revision of that fatal policy, which, by rapidly undermining the commercial marine of this country, is destroying the only safeguard on which, in the present critical state of Europe, England can rely."

After the execution of Merino for the attempt to assassinate the Queen of Spain, the next of the head was taken by Dr. Didier, of Madrid. A copy of this cast has arrived in Paris, and has been placed in the Museum of Anatomy, in the collection of the heads of great criminals.

In reply to an application from Mr. Beck, a publisher in Leamington, to the chairman of the board of Stamps and Taxes, in reference to a proposed publication similar to Dickens's Household Words, the following letter was received:—"Sir,—The board have had before them your letter of the 7th instant, and I am directed to state that they cannot advise you in the matter therein mentioned, as to which you must, therefore, exercise your own discretion.—THOMAS KEMP."

The Aberdeen Herald says, in reference to the alleged "diggings" in Skye, that our northern friends are unhappily labouring under a delusion. The metal approximates to the colour of gold, and has a clear bright glitter; but so have the metallic diamonds that sparkle in the sunbeams on our Sonestops, and which are at least of equal value with the produce of our Celtic California.

On Sunday his Grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury preached a sermon at the parish church, Clapham, on behalf of the Hospital for Consumption, and Diseases of the Chest. After a most eloquent discourse upon the subject, a collection was made, which amounted to £68 15s. 6d.

On Sunday mornings, between six and seven o'clock, a fire was discovered in the upper part of the premises of Messrs. Groom and Sons, wholesale stationers, Lord-street, Liverpool, which in a short time communicated to the Mercury office adjoining. In about half an hour, by the aid of the engines and a good supply of water, the flames were speedily overpowered, but not before the roof of Messrs. Groom's house was entirely destroyed, and a considerable amount of property, both in that house and the printing-office of the Liverpool Mercury, had been consumed.

Lord Monteagle has been elected president of the London Art-Union. The council have determined on issuing a medal, as part of their series, commemorative of the late Mr. Wyon, R.A., and have commissioned his son, Mr. L. Wyon, to execute it. It has also been determined to issue a series of illustrations of Byron's "Childe Harold" for a future year. A better subject could not have been selected.

The Government have given to the General Screw Steam Company for a monthly Indian postal service an extension of the line to the Cape, calling at Mauritius, Ceylon, and Calcutta. It will commence on the 15th of May, 1852, with the new iron screw steamer Queen of the South, 1750 tons, to be followed by the Lady Jocelyn, Jaxana, and Calcutta.

The Rev. Sidney Godolphin Osborne has given a donation of £10 to the charitable society of St. Vincent de Paul, at Kilrush.

Notwithstanding the immense sums of money which have been laid out on Plymouth dockyard, to improve its capabilities, it has no dock sufficiently capacious to take in H.M.S Arethusa; and that ship, which would otherwise have been paid off at that port, sailed for Portsmouth, on Thursday week, to the great annoyance of the inhabitants.

The estimate of the expense of the packet service department of the Post-office for the year 1853-53 is £870,158, viz. £792,267 for the contract packet service, and £77 871 for the expense of Queen's vessels employed in the packet service, being an increase, as compared with the year 1851-52, of £60 662.

It appears that the sum expended for the relief and management of the poor in Scotland for the year ending the 14th of May, 1851, including £21,238 expended on poor-house buildings, was £535,944 13s 6d., against £581,552 4s. 4d. disbursed in the preceding year. This shows a decrease in the expenditure of £45,607 10s. 9d. The number of paupers (1 in 9 of the population) on the 14th of May, 1851, was 76,906, being a decrease of 2150 since the same date last year

A circumstance has recently occurred which shows that the whole of the cells in the Seaford Cliff, near Brighton, were not spared by the Armada battery in the late explosion. Large bags of gunpowder have been discovered in the cliff to the entrance which the labouring men in the neighbourhood have risked their lives. We understand that one man has in this way procured several cwt. of gunpowder; and that Government having been informed of the fact, have issued placards cautioning persons against keeping it, and that in consequence a large quantity has been placed in one of the magazines.

On Saturday last the bill to give effect to a convention with France on copyright in dramatic and other works was printed, by which dramatic writers may prevent for a limited time unauthorised translations. There are fourteen sections in the bill.

Le Bulletin Français, banished from Belgium, is now transplanted to a more congenial soil, and, with its talented authors, has now a home in London. In No. VIII., just published, M. Briard says his subscribers ought to be astonished that he, a Belgian bookseller, should serve them through a London firm. "English presses, those which alone remain free in Europe, must be employed to publish that truth which can never find room in the taste of Bonaparte's censors." The Bulletin Français is now published by Mr. Jeffs.

A considerable number of the registered coalwhippers of the port of London struck last week for an advance of 2d. on the usual price of 7d. per ton paid for delivering coals from the colliers into barges. The leaders of the movement declare that it has been successful, resistance to their claim on the part of the masters having been in exception, and compliance the rule.

One of the monkeys in Wombwell's menagerie, which was exhibiting at Bristol, last week, escaped from his cage, and running along the bars in front of the adjoining cages, was seized by a leopard, drawn into his den, and devoured.

We learn from Norwich that the fall of snow in the eastern parts of England has been so great as to impede the railway traffic. On Friday week the mail-train, which left the Bishopgate station at nine o'clock in the morning, was completely blocked up with snow. Instead of arriving at Norwich at two o'clock, it did not reach that city until nine o'clock.

It is stated that an extensive commission, composed of painters and sculptors, will be nominated in Paris. Its especial object will be to select and project for each of the principal towns of the republic the subject for a picture, bust, picture, or portrait relative to the locality where it is to be exhibited, either in the mairie or other place open to the people. The public exchequer will have to bear the half of the costs of these monuments, the other half to be paid by the department of the commune.

The Worcester Chronicle states that on Monday week, as a man named Styler was at his employ as a fish-hook marker in the establishment of Messrs. Bartlett, at Redditch, he had occasion to go into the engine-room to get some oil; but he had not been in the place many seconds before the engine caught the governor, when the workmen found him under the main crank of the engine, crushed in a dreadful manner, though still living. He had been drinking in the morning. He died in about a quarter of an hour

A fire occurred at Enfield on Sunday morning, at an early hour, which there is too much reason to fear was the work of an incendiary. The owner of the property destroyed is Mr. John Whaley, a gentleman of fortune. The damage was confined to the destruction of one stack of wheat and one clover rick. The police are on the alert to discover the origin of the fire. Mr. Whaley is insured.

THE RECENT DISCOVERY IN ST. STEPHEN'S CRYPT, WESTMINSTER.

In our Journal for January 31 we described and illustrated this very interesting archæological discovery. We subjoin the Report of the Committee appointed by the Society of Antiquaries to examine and report on the body; and who, at the meeting of the society on the 12th inst., made an elaborate statement of the circumstances under which it had been found, its appearance, condition, and history. They entered into a variety of historical and other particulars, leading to a strong opinion that it was the body of William Lyndewood, or Lyndwode, Bishop of St David's, author of the well-known work entitled "Provinciale," on the Canons of the Church, and a statesman much employed by Henry V. in the affairs of government. This portion of the report contains a complete life of Lyndewood, chiefly made up from Tanner and from the records of the Privy Council. It is remarkable, as was observed, that none of our ordinary biographies contain the slightest notice of a man so eminent; and the committee have done good service in collecting together all the known circumstances of his career, from his boyhood to his death, and weaving them into a consecutive narrative. The precise year of his birth does not seem to have been ascertained; but he died in 1446, at about the age of 70. He was educated at Cambridge, and subsequently sent by Henry V both to France and to Spain on public business. He was not made Bishop of St. David's until late in life; and then he built a chantry in the Chapel of St. Stephen's, where he was interred. The curious particulars of his will have been obtained from the archives at Lambeth, so that this new biography has been rendered as complete as possible from all sources of information. When the body was found, the pastoral staff was lying across it from the left shoulder to the right foot. One main purpose of the report seemed to be to remove a notion that the corpse had been treated with needless disrespect. Careful drawings have been made of the appearance of the relic, and a cast has been taken of the face, the features of which are in a singularly perfect state. This cast we have engraved from an accurate drawing made by M. Bangniet. The details of the unrolling of the body were given in our Journal of the 7th inst.

We have likewise engraved the head only of the pastoral staff, which itself is perfect as regards length, and is but very slightly damaged in its ornamentation. The head is most beautiful, the crockets of pierced foliage-work being of exquisite taste in design. When found, the staff appeared of a dark colour; but it is now nearly white, apparently primed for gilding; though, as no remains of gilding appears, it is probable it was simply painted, and not enriched with gilded work.

MERCHANTS' MARKS DISCOVERED IN THE CRYPT OF GERARD'S HALL.

This fine relic of the architecture of the 13th century, of which some account, together with a View, appeared in the Illustrated London News for September 20, 1851, is on the eve of demolition, the premises above being already cleared out. The inscriptions are shown in the accompanying cut, and were discovered in the recess of one of the gates mentioned by Stowe, leading by a short flight of steps up to the inn yard. They consist of two coats of arms of later date than the connexion of the building with the family of Gisors, a cross of Calvary, the initials

They are rudely cut in the Caen stone which lines the entrance. The crypt contains other indications worthy of notice, and which may be investigated with advantage when the process of clearing shall have advanced.

REFUGE BUOY-BEACON.

The ordinary buoys in use on the English coast and elsewhere, for pointing out the position of dangerous shoals and sandbanks, are of a conical form, made chiefly of wood, and hooped like a cask, being moored with the apex or sharp end downwards; and, owing to this shape, in a strong tide-way and heavy sea they are at times nearly pulled under water, tugging with an immense strain upon their moorings, and frequently breaking adrift at the very time when most required; moreover, from their construction they twist and twirl so as to render them impossible of approach or refuge for saving life in cases of shipwreck. Captain George Peacock, the Superintendent and Dock-master of the Southampton Docks, has invented a new kind of mark-buoy, or floating beacon, which, from its peculiar form and construction, and the manner in which it is moored, rises over the crest of the waves in the heaviest gales and strongest tide, and is not acted upon like the ordinary buoy; it is, in fact, capable of holding from ten to twelve persons with ease in case of contiguous shipwreck, and of affording them a safe temporary asylum—it being in fact at once a buoy, beacon, and lifeboat; and the cost of it scarcely exceeds that of the ordinary buoys now in use.

The plan and model having been approved of by the Pier and Harbour Commissioners of Southampton, one of these buoy-beacons was laid down off the Spit, at Calshot Castle, on the 12th of August last, and has withstood the whole of the severe gales of the last six months without showing the least symptom of injury or leakage.

CAPTAIN PEACOCK'S REFUGE BUOY-BEACON

The hull, which is of sheet iron, is of a semi-oval shape, like the horizontal half of an egg, being 10 feet long, 7 feet broad, and three feet deep; the deck, a perfect oval, is convex, with a man-hole and cover in the centre. A kelson of pine timber, 18 inches deep and 14 inches broad, is fitted to the inside, running fore and aft, and fayed on to the shape of the bottom upon the rivets; and the mooring bolt with a broad bearing-shoulder is passed diagonally up through this kelson and firmly secured by a large nut over a plate of iron or washer on the top of the same. This mooring-bolt is also fixed at one-third the length of the hull from the large end or breast, and along the other two-thirds of the bottom an iron keel 15 inches deep and 250 lb. weight is rivetted on with angle iron, and bolted through the kelson, which keeps the buoy steady to the tide, and also gives it stability. To the side or rim, which is 18 inches deep and inclined inwards, uniting the deck with the bottom, eight triangular-shaped wooden uprights are fixed at equal distances in outside sockets bolted through with nuts and screws; these stancheons are 9 feet in length, terminating and dovetailing into an oval platform, 6 feet by 4 feet, and are braced horizontally by two rows of corresponding pieces at equal distances from each other, the first row being 4 feet from the deck; and the divisions above this are nearly filled up by vertical battens to the top of the platform, all firmly united with hoop iron. There are also two diagonal braces of rod-iron, which cross each other in the centre of the structure; whilst seats are fixed at each end on a level with the first horizontal brace pieces, affording accommodation for six persons, and leaving standing room for six more in the centre of the deck. Under the platform a large bell is fixed with four swinging clappers hanging round it from the platform and striking the outside; whilst the centre clapper has its stem below the hammer elongated with rod iron to five feet, terminating in a wind-cross of thin sheet-iron, so as to ring the bell with the least breeze when the water is too smooth to affect the clappers.

Above the platform, arching from side to side, is a semicircle of square iron rod, which assists in uniting the sides or top ends of the uprights or stancheons to the platform, and to which rim is rivetted a plate of thin iron, with the name of the buoy painted on it; and above the centre of this arch, forming the apex of the buoy-beacon, is a spindle carrying a pyramidal speculum, ten inches in angle, which, revolving freely as the buoy moves, reflects the rays of the sun and moon, and occasionally Calshot light: the reflected flashes of the sun's rays are visible at a distance of seven to eight miles from a vessel's deck, and the buoy-beacon itself is seen in clear weather four to five miles off, or three times the distance of ordinary buoys of the largest size; in thick weather it looms like a small vessel at anchor. The top of the speculum is twelve feet above the water-line.

The commanders of steamers and other vessels frequenting the port of Southampton, and all the pilots, give a unanimously favourable report of this buoy-beacon, and strongly recommend its general adoption upon all outstanding dangers: they say that it rises over the tops of the seas without plunging or diving, or being in the least affected by the action of the tide beyond sheering from side to side within the scope of its mooring chain during a gale across the tide, and thus rendering itself more conspicuous by presenting two-thirds of its broadside each way alternately; and in heavy gales of wind from the most exposed quarters, namely, S.E. and W.S.W. at the strongest period of a spring tide, it is seen to ride upon the crest of waves that completely overwhelm the neighbouring buoys of the Bramble, Leep, &c. It has not been baled or pumped out since it first went into the water; and upon taking off the manhole-cover, after it had been lain down six months, it was found to be as tight as a cup. As a proof of its stability, two persons at one time have sat on the top of the platform when afloat, without its showing any signs of being crank. The cost of this buoy-beacon, including bells, fittings, &c., was £55.

PALANQUIN CARRIAGE FOR JAVA.

The proverbial skill of English coach-building would appear to have reached Java, for the elegant carriage here engraved has just been built for a Chinese resident in the above island. The builders are Messrs. Holmes, of Derby, to the order of Mr. W. Major, of Java.

The carriage is a palanquin, to be drawn by four small horses. It is constructed with two roofs—the upper one bordered with elegant fringe, and fixed several inches above the lower, for the purpose of resisting the powerful rays of the sun. The several windows are supplied with curtains, glasses, and blinds, the latter "Venetian," to secure a thorough ventilation of the interior of the carriage. Accommodation is afforded for four persons inside, besides two on the front seat; and there are platforms behind, arranged for three footmen. The underworks are on the elliptic spring principle; the body-mouldings are covered with silver, and the painting and decorations are in a style of Oriental magnificence.

The inspection of this elegant carriage, and other well-appointed carriages built in England for exportation, has frequently caused us to lament that an annual carriage-tax, whereof the coachmakers so justly and so generally complain, should continue to fetter a branch of manufacture in which this country stands decidedly pre-eminent.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

MISS VANDENHOFF'S NEW PLAY OF "WOMAN'S HEART."

We present this week an Illustration of the leading situation in Miss Vandenhoff's original and elegant drama. In consequence of her indisposition the play was not performed a second time until last Saturday. It improves on representation. The situation before us is not only novel, but exceedingly interesting on the score of its artistic sentiment. The lover, with his mistress for a model, presents a scene of fine picturesque effect; painter and object are each under the influence and agitation of individual feelings. The expression of these requires much judicious by-play on the part of both performers. Miss Vandenhoff here acquits herself with much power, and with a fine feeling for effect which claims recognition for higher than mere stage qualities. The dramatic poet's art comes in aid of the histrionic, and their united influence supercauces a charm intuitively felt by the audience, though difficult to be described by the critic.

NEW STAINED GLASS WINDOW IN ST. STEPHEN'S CHURCH, WALBROOK.

The late repairs of this celebrated work of Wren have included the introduction of the very handsome and costly window here engraved, which is the gift of the Grocers' Company, the patrons of the living. This window has been designed and executed by Mr. Willement, in the style adopted by Raffaelle in his decorations of churches of the Roman order of architecture. The two subjects in the central division represent the Ordination and the Stoning of St. Stephen; the compartments on each side being occupied by representations of the four Evangelists, with their appropriate emblems; the semicircular top contains the figure of our Saviour, angels in devotional attitudes, and the Lamb bearing the banner of the Cross. The height of the window is 21 feet, its width 12 feet 2 inches. The place it occupies, immediately over the altar, was formerly filled by West's painting of the Stoning of St. Stephen," which entirely excluded the light from this portion of the edifice, rendering it dull and gloomy. West's picture has been cleaned, and is now placed on the north wall of the church.

REBUILDING OF ST. MARY'S CHURCH, LAMBETH.

This Church has been, except the north tower, entirely rebuilt, and was opened for divine service on the 3d inst. The new edifice is built upon the old foundations. The style of the architecture is Early Decorated. The plan comprises a nave, with aisles, clerestory, and a well-proportioned chancel; the principal entrance porch being on the south side.

The appearance of the interior of the Church is very good; its lofty open timber roof, the windows of varied design and the fonts with its elaborate oak cover, present an effect of great richness. Our Engraving, taken from the western end, shows the general features to which we have alluded; and when the east window is filled with stained glass, as intended, the appearance of the chancel will be greatly improved. Several of the windows are already filled with stained glass in the south nave, north transepts, and on the north and south sides of the chancel; some of them being gifts, and others mortuary windows. Of the latter are those placed in by Mr. Wood, Mrs. Swabey, Mrs. D'Oyley, and Mr Kuyvett. The pede-cloth to the chancel was worked by ladies, as also the cushions in front of the altar rails. There are galleries in the north and south aisles set back from the columns which divide the nave from the aisles, and these are parts of the old Church fittings. The font, and its cover, are the gift of Sir George Young. The former is of stone, and on the sides are emblematical subjects, and the symbols of the Evangelists, in quatrefoils. The pierced cover to the font is of oak, and the whole is of good design and workmanship. A few of the mural tablets are placed on the walls; but many of them are placed in the south porch, which, by the way, has a good stained window commemorative of the rebuilding of the Church.

ALARMING FIRE AT TRINITY HALL, CAMBRIDGE.

On the morning of yesterday week the town of Cambridge was alarmed by a fire which had broken out at Trinity Hall, in the rooms of Mr. Nunn, a Fellow Commoner of that society, on the right-hand staircase under the front gateway. A few minutes before six o'clock, Mr. Shepherd, a member of the College, who slept in the rooms immediately above those of Mr. Nunn, was awakened by smoke and a smell of fire. He immediately raised an alarm, which brought a servant who was on the next staircase, when smoke was seen to issue through air-holes communicating with a cupboard in Mr. Nunn's gyp-room, in which was a collection of patent fire-lights, lamps, &c. Assistance was derived from various parts of the College, and an attempt was made to subdue the flames, which had already reached the bedroom of Mr. Starkie. Up to this time Mr. Nunn remained asleep in his bed, unconscious of the imminent danger in which he was placed. Fortunately, he was aroused just in time to enable him to escape in his night-shirt.

The alarm quickly spread through the town, and assistance poured in from all quarters, the Master of Trinity College, we understand, being one of the first on the spot. By half-past six the following engines had arrived:—Phœnix, town engine, Norwich Union, Royal Farmers', Trinity College, St. John's College, and the Sun. The town engine first commenced playing on the outside of the College, but was removed to Garrat's Hurst Bridge, whence it kept up a supply of water to the other engines; the Phœnix being placed in the first court of the College, and doing excellent service there. The fire, however, kept spreading; and, but for the united efforts of the brigade, and three of Manns' Quinee and Attack's men, who stripped the tiles from the roof on each side of the flames, —the Norwich Union playing on one side, and the Royal Farmers' on the other—the greater portion of the College would, probably, have been destroyed, especially as the wind was blowing strongly at the time. Mr. Hazard was most active in the direction of the Sun engine

The fire was not subdued until nine o'clock, at which time four suits of rooms, with most of their furniture, had been destroyed. The occupiers of the rooms were Messrs Nunn, Morris, Starkie, and Shepherd (undergraduates). The rooms of Messrs. Jenner, Wynne, Stevens, Grimstone, and Healey were also damaged. None of these gentlemen were insured. The College, of course, was more prudent: the damage to the building is said to be about £1500 or £2000, which is covered by the insurance.

The gownsmen, according to their custom upon those occasions, worked manfully in the bitter cold and frosty air.

Amongst the property lost (says the Cambridge Chronicle), we hear of three gold watches, two pair of silver candlesticks, a number of silver spoons and forks, &c.

MUSIC.

GRAND CONCERT AT EXETER-HALL.

Dramatic performances being prohibited on Ash-Wednesday, singers are permitted to perform, in oratorio pieces, that which they are forbidden to do in stage costumes. The opportunity was, therefore, seized to present a monster concert at Exeter-hall, by some sly speculator, who dignified his undertaking with the sounding title of "grand musical festival," which, although wanting in a colossal chorus, and having only a very limited orchestra, still had features of attraction, from the number of vocalists brought together in the programme, and from a mixed selection of music, sacred and secular matter. The audience was prodigious, except in the scanty seats, the high-priced stalls immediately in front of the orchestra. The first part, conducted by Mr. F. Mori, opened with gleanings from the "Messiah," the "Creation," and Mozart's twelfth mass, curiously interwoven with which sacred themes were Beethoven's "Adelaida," superbly sung by Mr. Sims Reeves (and which infinitely more merited the encore than that awarded to the air "in native worth," which he gave with that sickly sentimentality (the besetting sin of his style). Beethoven's air "In questa tomba," inadequately rendered by Miss Rinckes, and the adagio and rondo of the same composer's grand pianoforte concerto in C minor (one of which Miss Goddard's powers fully do justice. Miss Allayne's intonation was distressingly at fault in "Rejoice greatly," and Miss Messent was scarcely up to the mark in the air "But thou didst not leave." Miss Phillips, the daughter of the popular basso of that name, made a very favourable impression by her début on this occasion, despite of nervousness. She is very young, but has been well taught: her articulation of the words is admirable, and her voice is penetrating in quality, but is rarely yet developed. Mr. Lockey Reeves is heard to much greater advantage in the concert-room than on the stage. Mr. Whitworth is gaining ground as he acquires experience and confidence: he is always painstaking

In the second part, Miss Eyles's chaste interpretation of Mendelssohn's "Oh, rest in the Lord" (redemanded with acclamation), Mr. Swift's sympathetic tones in the air "Then shall the righteous shine forth," and Miss Rinckes's execution of Mendelssohn's "Rondo brillante," were the prominent items. The trio, "Lift thine eyes," by Misses Ransford, Isaacs, and Lascelles, was almost a break-down, owing to a want of harmonic blending. Mendelssohn's "midsummer Night's Dream," conducted by Signor Schira, Mr. Thirlwall leader, was played with remarkable spirit and precision by the band of Drury Lane Theatre.

The third part of this long entertainment was of the ordinary heterogeneous materials, beginning with the "Der Freyschütz" overture, and ending with the National Anthem, and the whole only seasoned with the individual "bits" of pieces of the artistes. To the names of those recorded above must be added M. Demunck, the accomplished violoncellist; Mr. Richardson, the expert flautist; Mdlle. Garcia, of Drury-lane Theatre; Herr Jonghmans, Mr. Bodda, Mr. Drayton. Miss Kate Loder and Miss Goddard also executed Osborne's pianoforte duet on themes from the "Huguenots," their brilliant playing of which we have recorded on a former occasion.

THE MELODISTS' CLUB.

The second meeting of the present season took place at Freemasons' Hall, on Thursday night. The Club was established in 1835, for the encouragement of melody and English vocal compositions; after which period the books record a long list of prizes won by the late T. Cooke, Hawes, C. Horn, and Parry; and, amongst living composers, by Messrs. Benett, Hobbs, John Parry, and Professor Taylor. Charles Smith, Esq., was in the chair. Amongst the amateurs and professors present were Messrs. W. Dixon, D'Almaine, Collard, Addison, Farrer, Osborne, Gray, Foster, Bradbury, Turle, King, M Smith, H. Gear, &c. The Grace was by Professor Taylor. "Non Nobis" was given after a excellent banquet. The glees were "Breathe my Harp," "Hark, Apoll strikes the Lyre," and the Bacchanal Chorus from "The Miller and his Men" by Sir H. R. Bishop. The first-mentioned glee is little known, and is a charming composition; it was well sung by Messrs. Foster, M. Smith, Gear, and Bradbury. A well-constructed glee, by Mr. Osborne, the pianist, "Oh, linger in this hour," was given by the composer, his brother tenor, and Mr. Foster. The sum of glees of the night, in point of exquisite execution, was Horsley's poet's "By Cada's Arbour," rendered by Messrs. Foster, M. Smith, Gear, and Bradbury, which was rapturously re-demanded. Mr. Foster, as we have remarked on a former occasion, has one of the most sympathetic counter-tenor voices of our heard, accompanied with taste and sentiment of unexceptionable quality. Songs were given by Messrs. M. Smith and Gear, and in Shield's "Curly-headed Ploughboy"), Mr. C. Osborne, and Mr. H. Gear. Mr Osborne performed his own fantasia on Irish airs, and an elegant serenade, with good effect. The chairman gave the loyal and social toasts with considerable humour and tact.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

ITALIAN OPERA IN ST. PETERSBURG.—On Tuesday last (the 24th in last) the brilliant Italian Opera season was to be terminated. For the benefit of Signor Ferzoni, the new tenor, Donizetti's "Elisir d'Amore" was given, with Mdme. Persiani, Tamburini, and Ronconi; Ronconi being the Dominoro. For Tadolini's benefit Grisi appeared, as she created quite a furore in Norma. For her own benefit she played Lucrezia Borgia, and was called before the curtain twenty times. The Empress of Russia made her first visit on this occasion of a Cabinet matinée, with 4,000 roubles (£800), besides the tiara of pearls and diamonds, rings, &c., previously given to her by the Emperor. For Tamburini's benefit, Bellini's "Puritani" was represented: Mario, whose voice at the early part of the season had been in a precarious state, sang divinely as Arturo. For the benefit of Mario, Signor Alary's new tragic opera, founded on Lord Byron's "Sardanapalus," was produced with the greatest splendour in the Emperor and Empress and all the court were present, and Grisi and Mario were repeatedly called for, besides the composer. Alary, it may be remembered, wrote the comic opera "Le Tre Nozze," for Sontag, Gardoni, and Lablache, which was originally produced in Paris, and afterwards at Her Majesty's Theatre. Ronconi quite took the Russian amateurs by storm this season in "Maria di Rohan" and Verdi's "Nabucco" ("Nino"—"Assur"). Herr Formes, in Marcel (in Meyerbeer's "Huguenots") and in Basilio ("Il Barbiere"), had been eminently successful. The new prima donna Signora Medori had been very successful. Tamberlik was an especial favourite, and in Otello, at his benefit, quite electrified the house. The re-engagements for the season 1852-53 were Grisi, Ronconi, Tagliafico, Herr Formes, Tamberlik, and Mario. Madame Grisi and Tamburini do not return.

MUSIC IN PARIS.—Gevaert's new three-act comic opera, "Le Carillonneur de Bruges," the libretto by M. de St. Georges, the music by M. Grisar, was produced on the 20th inst. at the Théâtre de l'Opéra Comique, with the greatest success. The principal parts were sustained by Mdlle. Wertheimber, a pupil of the Conservatoire, Mdlle. Révilly, M. Mocker, Roger, Bonfo, and Reignier. Halévy's "Juif Errant," for the début of Mdlle. Lagrua, will be produced speedily at the Grand Opéra. Maralti has reappeared in Siegfried, in "La Juive," Madame Persiani and Mdlle. Poinsot in "Lucia di Lammermoor," and Mdlle. Lagrua in "La Maria di Rohan," at the Italian Opera, with great applause. Mdlle. Angri, the celebrated contralto, was engaged by Mr. Lumley, and was to appear in Rossini's "Italiana in Algieri."

MEYERBEER'S GRAND NEW OPERA.—Herr Teschner's new opera, "Ilka," has been successfully produced at the Wilhelmstadt Theatre, Berlin. Madame Sontag is now at Weimar, after a brilliant series of representations at Leipsic. As she could not appear at Berlin, where the Comte de Redern has forbidden her to sing in Auber's "Domino Noir," Meyerbeer has conducted her to Weimar, where the Grand Duke Carl Alexander, the amateur of the Prussian capital went by railroad to the Leipsic Theatre, the prices of admission being tripled. Madame Sontag will go to Dresden and Vienna after her engagements are concluded at Weimar.

MARRIAGE OF JENNY LIND.—The announcement in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS last week of this event, which took place on the 5th inst., at Boston, with Otto Goldschmidt, the pianist, of Hamburgh, has been verified by this week's advices from America.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

The notion of Terpsichore appearing in a village where dancing had been strictly prohibited by the authorities, and causing, by her magical influence, all the villagers to dance, and afterwards the dignified magistrate who issued the order, has been oftimes burlesqued in the days of Farrer, but was never produced so successfully on Tuesday night, under the title of the "Star of the Opera, and so cleverly sustained, that it is found by the repetition of Mr. Farrer, a twinkling fact, and by Mr. W. H. Payne, a thoroughly pompous and grotesque burgomaster, that the new ballet fantastique is rather more than an hour's duration will be much longer ere the public grow weary of its graceful pretensions. The two pas de deux between Mdlle. Plunkett and M. Durand, the pas in which the fay of the Rhine not less the burgomaster dance, and the "Valse Hyrolienne" in which Mdlle. Rose is joined by the peasants at a ball, are ingeniously contrived, and were much applauded, Mdlle. Plunkett and M. Durand being sometimes unmercifully compelled to repeat some of their graceful tours de force. The music, by M. Boisselot, is light and graceful, and eminently fest inspiring.

The benefit for the sufferers of the Amazon, under the gracious patronage of her Majesty, last Saturday, proved a brilliant failure, despite of the appearance of the gifted actress, Miss Helen Faucit, and of a combination of musical and dancing attractions. Owing to an accide to Mr. Anderson, the play of the "Hunchback" was substituted at the eleventh hour for "Romeo and Juliet;" Mr. Cooper read the part of Master Walter, and Miss Faucit, (formerly of Her Majesty's Theatre), Mdlle. Evelit a Garcia, Miss Rebecca Isaacs, M. Sainton, and Mr. Whitworth sang; and Miss A. Goddard performed on the pianoforte.

In the course of next week the new four-act opera by Mr. Balfe, the libretto by M. de St. Georges and Mr. Bunn, entitled "The Siculian Bride," will be produced, altered, and with the following cast:—Mr. F. Berrin, Mr. Tourniaire (the new baritone), Mr. Whitworth, Mr. Drayton, Mr. S. Jones, and Mr. Simms Reeves.

PRINCES'

The "Corsican Brothers," adapted from the well-known French drama, was produced on Monday. Unique in its way, it must be considered rather as a possibility—a curiosity—than as an example of being the best display ever made of ghosts, such as Hamlet, but those machine-ghosts, which at most, it takes rank with the "Castle Spectre" and "Fabian dos Franchi" (Mr. Kean) is visited in Corsica by seers; and M. Fabian des Franchi (Mr. a duel in France, a spectral tableau the wraith of his brother, who is killed vivant, and circumstances occur accordingly at the same moment discovering the age as to murder him. In the meanwhile Fabien reaches Paris in five days; and he meeting with Mr. de Château-Renaud (Mr. Alfred Wigan) in the forest of Fontainebleau, kills him in mortal combat and kills third act. The second is occupied with the his facts and preliminaries of the ori- final duel, which are supposed to happen simultaneously with the visions of the first act. The two acts, therefore, are supposed to represent two different actions in space, but not in time. The same is a boldness in construction which makes the structure of the drama a subject lends the interest of singularity to its try attentive inquiry, and, at any rate, characters of both the Corsican brothers, and is a charming entertainment. Mr. Kean performs sented as partaking the gallies of Pierre, in defence of the reputation of a lady of rank, the occasion of the duel. The interval between the first and second acts is occupied with a ball and carnival, was magnificently planned, and the scenes and costumes are gorgeousness and multitude. The ries were perfect, bewildering in the manner of introducing visionary tableaux were also fine, and of a perpendicular one, lent the ghost by a lateral ascent, instead of which was irresistably effective. a supernatural appearance to the scene. Mr. Kean's acting of his two characters is admirable, being recorded with that quiet points of telling efficiency which distinction as are so rare in modern acting, and in which, indeed, Mr. Charles Mathews and d Mr. Charles Kean are now the only masters. The drama was entirely success- ful.

ST. JAMES'.

Mdlle. Dejazet appeared on Monday in the Duc de Richelieu, in the piece entitled "Les Premières Armes de Richelieu" with great and peculiar talent. Lafont was in Countess being admirably represented by Mdlle. Avenel.

TAXES ON KNOWLEDGE.—On Wednesday evening, the annual meeting of the Association for Promoting the Repeal of the Taxes on Knowledge was held at St Martin's-hall, Long-acre. The large room was readily crowded on the occasion. Mr. M. Gibson, M.P., Mr. Cobden, M.P., Mr. Scholefield, M.P., and Mr. Hume, M.P., were loudly cheered on making their appearance on the platform. Mr. M. Gibson was voted into the chair. Letters were read from Mr. Leigh Hunt and Mr. Douglas Jerrold, severally apologising for their inability to attend. The following resolution, which was moved by Mr. Edwards and seconded by Mr. Scholefield, M.P., was agreed to unanimously:—"That the duties on paper, advertisements, and newspapers carried the liberty of the press, obstruct the diffusion of knowledge, and are inconsistent with the professions of the Legislature in favour of popular education." Mr. Cobden proposed the next resolution:—"That the multiplication of the amount of revenue yielded by the newspaper stamp shews that it is now retained, as it was originally enacted, for the purpose of destroying the independence of the press, and preventing the circulation of cheap newspapers." Mr. Dawson seconded the resolution, which was supported by Mr. O'Brien, and carried unanimously. Mr. Cobden, M.P., and Mr. Hume, M.P., severally addressed the meeting. The former honourable gentleman, in the course of his remarks, said:—Let them once abolish that monopoly, and he would guarantee four times the number of papers they had now, and four times the demand for literary talent. Reporters would then not be the mere shades of honourable members, but better than the pasts and scissors, or those who wrote thundering leaders, would have a better chance of patrons. The penny-a-liner, when he got hold of a good fat accident, would get three times what he now got for his daily task. These were the men for whom he asked their sympathy. They educated a man, and then they placed him in a position where he could not avail himself of the use of his talents, and he did not know a more melancholy spectacle than to be pitied than this man. The labouring man, who had not to be trained to any of this refined capacity had ten times a greater chance of finding employment. He would call on all those then present, and on those who lived by the cultivation of literature to join in that movement, the object of which was to put an end to the restrictions on their industry. The usual vote of thanks having been given to the chairman, the meeting separated.

ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.—On Monday night a general meeting of the members of the Royal Geographical Society was held in the theatre of the Royal Institution, Albemarle-street; Sir Roderick Murchison, Bart., in the chair. The meeting was a numerous one, crowded. The President, in proposing Captain Beaston as a member of the Royal Geographical Society, dwelt at some length on the services in which he was about to engage for the rescue of Sir John Franklin and his companions. Captain Fitz Roy Arctic reports, and urged that the great claims he had upon their consideration [illegible] Mr. Beaston, [illegible] of Africa, describing the [illegible] Mr. Beaston was amongst the early warriors [illegible] Mexico. The paper was received with great [illegible] Colonel Sykes, M.P., read the [illegible] by Mr. Thornton during the years [illegible] From the statement it would be found that there was a marked difference between the two countries of Egypt and England, the greater amount of rain falling in Egypt, whilst in this country it fell most largely in summer.—The thanks of the society were then given to Dr. Thompson, and the meeting adjourned

MUSEUM OF ECONOMIC GEOLOGY.—On Monday evening Mr. Robert Hunt delivered a lecture on photography, at the Museum of Practical Geology, to an audience of artisans. The lecturer commenced by giving a succinct history of the art of sun-painting, from the days of Wedgwood to the present time. Hundreds of years back, the alchemists Basil Valentine remarked the fact that chloride of silver blackened by exposure to the rays of the sun; but the fact was not applied, until many years after, to any commercial purpose. It was not until the time of Professor Scheele, who proved that the blackening in question was not effected by every portion of the primitive spectrum alike. Our own countryman, Wedgwood, applying the fact still further, succeeded in copying the pen-and-ink sketch produced by means of paper imbued in chloride of silver. This may be said to have been the first application of sun painting; but, unfortunately the pictures were not permanent, exposure to the sun's rays rendering the whole white to coarse. The next step in the art of sun painting on paper was the discovery of the fact that hyposulphite of soda dissolved away the unblackened portions of the chloride—a process by which the pictures were rendered permanent. The first of the modern sun-painting processes, that by silver, was developed into its present form by M. Daguerre having worked out certain ideas originally promulgated by M. Niepce. It was a curious fact, and one demonstrative that the luminous portion of the sun's rays was not necessarily the most chemically-active, that in tropical countries Talbotype and Daguerreotype pictures were much more difficult of development than in the temperate zones. Hence philosophers regarded the actinic agency as something which is neither heat nor light, but which has been named actinism. The lecture was listened to with the greatest attention.

LONDON UNIVERSITY COLLEGE.—On Wednesday the annual general meeting of the proprietors was held in the College, in Gower-street. The chair was taken by Sir James Graham, M.P. The Lord Mayor, Mr. Hume, M.P., Mr. J. Heywood, M.P., &c., were also present. Mr. Edward C. Addinson, the secretary, read the report of the council. It stated that the number of students in the faculty of medicine during the session 1850-51 was 200; in the faculty of arts during the same period, 304; total, 504: total, 504. The fees in the department of medicine amounted to £3252 8s.; in the department of arts, £3544 4s. 8d.; in the junior school, £4451: total, £11,297 9s. 8d. The receipts of the college during the past year had not been quite equal to the expenditure, and the council, therefore, in council, acting on the recommendation of a committee of their own body, had borrowed a sum of £4000. The expenses of the University Hospital during the past year were more than defrayed by the receipts. The valuable property made to the College were the orrery constructed by J. Ferguson, the self-taught astronomer, presented by Mr. Walker; and the works of Flaxman, constituting the Flaxman gallery, presented by Mrs. Flaxman, the sister-in-law and executrix of the sculptor. The report and accounts were received and adopted, and ordered to be printed. On the motion of the Lord Mayor, thanks were voted to Miss Maria Denman, for the gift to the college of the marble statue of Flaxman, executed by the sculptor. On the motion of Professor J. R. Quain, it was resolved—"That this meeting is of opinion that the time has arrived for reconstituting the University of London, on the basis of the admission of the graduates to a recognised position in the corporate body." Agreed to.

CHARING-CROSS HOSPITAL.—The usual anniversary festival of this excellent institution was celebrated on Tuesday at the London Tavern, by a numerous party, presided over by the Marquis of Winchester, who was supported by Lord Robert Grosvenor, Viscount Castlereagh, the Dean of Manchester, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Mr. Hankey (governor of the Bank of England), Mr. Sheriff Cotterell, Mr. Sheriff Somes, Mr. Alderman Sidney, Mr. Alderman Salomons, &c. A large assemblage was present. It appeared from the statement of the chairman that the funds of the institution, though managed with the strictest economy, do not suffice to provide the accommodation which the wants of the sick poor will speedily require. There is ample space for the establishment of fifty beds, in addition to the one hundred already in use. The necessity of establishing an infants' ward was also strongly urged, and the claims of the institution to the assistance of the benevolent were also put in general, to enable the authorities of the hospital to carry out the desired arrangement. In the course of the different addresses, a high eulogium was passed on the exertions of Dr. Golding Bird, and on the zeal and energies of Dr. Golding, to whose energies it owes its existence. The subscription list of the evening reached the sum of £800. The annual statement shows that during the past year there have been received into the hospital 1,799 in-patients, and 5,299 out-patients—altogether 7,098 patients, out of which 2288 were cases of accident. The total cost of the hospital during the year was £2493 11s. 2d.

ROYAL INFIRMARY FOR ASTHMA AND DISEASES OF THE CHEST.—On Tuesday the annual general meeting of the governors of this charity was held at the London Tavern; James Zulen, Esq., in the chair The report stated, that since the foundation of the infirmary, in 1814, 29,000 persons had been relieved at the institution. Several new wards have been opened for the reception of patients, many of whom have been discharged cured or greatly relieved. The number of out-patients during the past year was 1700, being an increase of 300 cases of the number during the year 1850, a large portion of whom were discharged cured, and of whom about 800 remain on the books under treatment at the present time, while the applications for relief daily increase. The report was unanimously adopted, some routine business transacted, and the proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

THE BREWERS' MONOPOLY.—On Tuesday evening a meeting of the Bermondsey Anti-Brewers' League was held in the Lecture-hall, Weare-street, Clapham New-road, for the purpose of explaining to the public its objects and intentions. The meeting was very well attended, and principally by the working classes. The chair was occupied by Mr. Pridmore, the secretary of the league, who, in opening the business of the evening, said the purpose of putting an end to the enormous profits of the brewers, obtained by means of the practical monopoly which they possessed. After noticing the extensive adulteration to which the present beer was subjected, he stated that the object of the league to agitate the metropolis to make these facts generally known to the working-classes, and to induce them to desist from the consumption of malt liquor until the brewers had reduced their prices. He also referred to the fact, that, notwithstanding the fall in the price of malt from the repeal of the corn laws, the price of beer still continued the same as previously, and he estimated that the working-classes of the metropolis were overcharged to the tune of no less a sum than £2,000,000 per day. He believed that a combination of the consumers could put an end to this system; but, if no other means were available, he thought that Government should interfere, and that an act of Parliament should be passed to regulate the price of beer in a fixed proportion to that of malt. Mr. Ridley contended that the public played into the hands of the brewers by their absurd prejudices for buying their beer at a licensed victualler's instead of at a beershop. The true way to annihilate the monopoly was for every family to brew for itself, which they might do now, in consequence of the low price of sugar, in a copper capable of holding a few gallons. He warned them against embarking in any joint-stock schemes for starting new breweries, which would prove a most unsound investment for their hard earned savings. This being merely a measure for the purpose of explaining the objects of the league no resolutions were passed, but the feeling of those present seemed very generally to sympathise with the arguments and recommendations of the various speakers.

METROPOLITAN WATER SUPPLY.—On Tuesday night a meeting of the ratepayers of Lambeth was held at the Horns Tavern, Kennington, to consider the great question of water supply and drainage, in connexion with the late bill introduced into Parliament by Mr. Hawes, M.P., and Mr. Wood, M.P. D'Eyncourt, M.P. Resolutions were adopted in favour of Mr. Hawes's bill, and declaring that any plan for the improvement and regulation of the water supply ought to be based upon the principle of self-government.

EQUITABLE EMPIRE MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.—The fifth annual meeting of this company was held at the offices, New Bridge-street, on Tuesday; John Gover, who was in the chair, congratulated the meeting on the wonderful success of the company. The total amount of the policies effected was £553,303; but the business done in the past year, the amount had upon life policies had been £2323 4s. 9d. and a saving of 10 per cent. had been effected on the expenses every year since the commence nent of the company. The report stated that a desirable addition had been made to the reserve fund. The adoption of the report was unanimously agreed to. The retiring directors and the auditor having been re-elected, the proceedings terminated.

GENERAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.—The fifty-fourth half-yearly meeting of the shareholders in this company was held at the offices, 71, Lombard-street; Mr. John Wilkin in the chair. The report of the directors, and a statement of the accounts for the year ending 31st of December last, were read to the meeting. The report, which was very satisfactory, was unanimously received by the proprietors, the usual dividend and bonus were declared, and the cordial thanks of the proprietors voted to the chairman and directors for their zealous services in the management of the company's affairs; after which the meeting separated.

ASYLUM FOR FEMALE ORPHANS, LAMBETH.—Last Sunday morning the Lord Mayor and sheriffs, accompanied by the officers of the city of London, attended divine service at the chapel of this institution. A general court of the guardians having recently determined to receive gratuitously the services of the Mayor for the ensuing year without election, three little orphans of the crew of the Amazon steamer, of which the Mayor-elect had been formerly master, and was only prevented from being present in consequence of severe and protracted indisposition. A most effective sermon was preached by the Rev. Stephen Hawtrey, after which a collection was made among the crowded congregation, and a large amount was collected for the benefit of the institution.

MERCHANT SEAMEN'S ORPHAN ASYLUM.—On Monday the twenty-fourth annual meeting of the governors of the Merchant Seamen's Orphan Asylum, Bow-road, was held at the London Tavern; Captain Nelson, of the Trinity House, in the chair. The report stated that the funds of the institution continued steadily to increase, and that the time had now arrived to place the charity above the contingency of temporary support, by its friends exerting themselves to obtain subscriptions to the building fund, which at present amounts to only £1,000. The number of the asylum children now enrolled was 290. 17s. 7d. The Trinity House had subscribed £100, and the Hon. East India Company £50. The charity sermons produced £37 9s. 9d. The number of children averaged for the year 195. The income for the year was £2704 6s. 10d., the expenditure £2739 9s. 11d., leaving in hand a balance of £58 16s. 11d. The report have no been adopted, the election of 13 pupils was proceeded with until four o'clock in the afternoon, when the chairman announced the result.

At the first, a special meeting, a resolution was adopted, suspending for six months the election of candidates for the ages of sixty-two. At the second, the annual general meeting, a report was read, which stated that the public support received for the past year was highly satisfactory to the governors, and that the funds were sufficient to enable them to elect at once nine more, with the prospect of another election by the next meeting a total of 66 pensioners in the asylum, and 119 since its foundation in 1837. The income for the past year was £2687 11s. 4d., and the expenditure £2440 7s. 10d. The funded property of the institution is largely advanced without interest by Sir C. Scott and Co. The moneys invested with the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt amount to £15,342 0s. 1d., being £567 1s. 6d. more than last year. Each pensioner receives in money £20 16s. per annum. After the adoption of the report the poll was opened, and was continued until four in the afternoon, when the chairman announced the number of votes given to each of the 69 candidates, and declared as elected the nine persons who obtained the greatest number.

BUILDERS' BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—The annual ball of this excellent institution took place on Tuesday, the 17th inst., at Willis's Rooms, King-street, St. James's. The company was numerous, nearly 700 persons being present, and dancing was kept up with much spirit until a late hour.

THE POOR-RATE.—On Tuesday an aggregate meeting of the guardians, churchwardens, and overseers of the parishes in the East, West, and City of London Unions, took place at the Guildhall Coffee-house, King-street, "for the purpose of endeavouring to induce the Government to introduce the promised measure of relief during the present session of Parliament." There was a large attendance, about 60 gentlemen being present. Mr. Alderman Sidney, M.P., presided. The following resolutions were agreed to:—"That the existing law of rating is most unfair and oppressive in its operation, is highly partial, and oppressive, inasmuch as they relieve property of the greatest rateable value from all but a nominal share of the cost for the relief and maintenance of the poor, while a most unfair and oppressive proportion of the burden is thrown on those parishes where the property is of the smallest rateable value, and in which the labouring class can find a home." "That a considerable loss is sustained to the ratepayers in the metropolitan parishes, of which they have just reason to complain, more especially after the said laws have been condemned by the reports of the poor-law authorities, by committees of both Houses of Parliament, and by very many of the most able boards of guardians throughout the kingdom." On the motion of Mr Pritchard, the High Bailiff of Southwark, supported by Mr. Hodges, a deputation was appointed to wait on Lord Stanley, in order to obtain the favour of his support in favour of a bill in the present session. Other resolutions followed, and the proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

METROPOLITAN SEWERS COMMISSION.—The annual statement of the receipts and expenditure under the commission has just been issued, from which it appears that in February, 1851, the balance of cash in hand was £4750 9s. 11d., and the total receipts during the year have amounted to £199,100 6s. 8d. The expenditure, as ascertained on the general basis, is—for works, £99,549 10s. 3d., this item including the cost of supervision and computation for damages. The cost of surveys has been £6332 19s 9d; management, £16,430 9s. 8d.; loans, £10,049 10s. 3d.; contingencies, £270 4s. 1d.; total payments, £131,464 19s. 8d.; and balance in hand, £3355 11s. 3d. Notwithstanding the disbursement of this large sum, the commission, partly from its constitution, and partly from the fact of the existing powers having been limited to 3d. in the pound, has been unable to commence the formation of that general drainage system about which so much was said eighteen months ago. The Thames remains as much polluted as ever, and is becoming even more so. The careful abolition of cesspools and formation of drains must tend to convert into a perfect Cocytus that which might at least be an inoffensive, if not a perfectly clear stream. The commission expires in August next.

On Wednesday night, at a crowded meeting held at the London Tavern, resolutions and petitions to Parliament against the proposed enrolment of the militia were adopted, after the expression by many of the speakers of a very strong condemnation of the proposed armament, which they regarded as calculated to encourage vague and groundless apprehensions at home, and to create irritation and distrust among neighbouring nations.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL ANNIVERSARY.—The school attached to the St John's Episcopal Chapel, London-road, Southwark, held its anniversary on Wednesday. It was established about seventeen years ago, in the outskirts of the parish of Christchurch, Surrey, by the Rev. John Gawtrey, at that time the incumbent of the chapel. For some years afterwards it was the only school of the kind in the parish, and, in fact, in that neighbourhood. During its term of existence 2000 children have been upon its books, and have received instruction for periods varying from a few months to eight or ten years. Nineteen of its teachers have risen to that office from being pupils, an t four of the teachers have been sent out of the Church of England's Training College. High honours at Trinity College, Cambridge; and another, last year, obtained a degree, and passed a first-class examination at University College, London; while several others have become schoolmasters and Scripture readers. The number at present in the school is 240; and the number admitted during the last year was 87. It has a lending library of religious books for the children. The examination upon the anniversary in question, which proved exceedingly gratifying both to the examiners and all who were present, was conducted by the Rev. W. Curling, M.A., chaplain of St. Saviour's, Southwark, the morning preacher of the chapel, and the Rev. H. Ayre Small, curate of St. George the Martyr, evening preacher. At the conclusion, after a brief exhortation from the Rev. Mr. Curling, the reward books were delivered, and the proceedings terminated.

MARRIAGE OF OMNIBUS SERVANTS.—A midnight meeting of the persons connected with the public carriages of the metropolis took place on Wednesday evening, or, rather, early on Thursday morning, at the Parthenon-rooms, St. Martin's-lane, for the purpose of protesting against what are considered to be the hardship of their condition, arising from what they allege to be the capricious and tyrannical conduct of their masters. At half-past twelve o'clock, Mr. William Tait, an omnibus driver, was called to the chair. Resolutions in accordance with the objects of the meeting were passed amidst great uproar, occasioned by the interruption of a party in the room who were opposed to the views of the majority.

LAMENTABLE AFFAIR.—Last week the body of a poor woman of the name of Stone was found lying upon the floor of an apartment in a house in Dean-street, Westminster. It was supposed she had been dead seven or eight days. On the premises were two bottles labelled "poison," and in the stomach of the deceased was found about an ounce of laudanum. She had been in the habit for two years of going to the churchyard and weeping over the grave of her husband and Lizzie Stone, Mother was 57½ years old, and in trouble, Mrs. Ann Stone came by her death by a draught of laudanum, no one knowing that she did take it, as she is a total stranger in the house as is in. Every effort she has made to obtain an honest living failed her. She has the presumption to throw her soul into the presence of the Almighty, and she fervently prays that God will have mercy on her soul. Good Christians, do not allow a number of persons to look on my unfortunate body. I have performed all the offices that are requisite; the body is quite ready for the coffin." She then begs that she may be buried in the same grave with her husband, and expresses a fear that the new Victoria-street may destroy it. She concludes, "If I could have died on my husband's grave-stone, I would have done so."

CARDINAL WISEMAN'S "LENTENT INDULT."—A document so called was read on Sunday in all the Roman Catholic churches and chapels in London, in which it is stated that the Pope has lasted unyelled leisure, granted as a jubilee or period of special devotion to be held during the month of March, on account of the many calamities which beset the Church and society. "Some of them," writes the Cardinal, "such as the increasing evils under the Czar, on the Continent to overthrow all rule and law, social order, the prevalence of dark conspiracies, the habitual contempt of law and authority, may not seem to affect us directly; but when we consider how invariably these attempts are leagued with hatred of religion, and how the contempt of its holy institutions is rebellion against its Divine claim, we cannot refuse to sympathise with our holy father when he bewails their existence." In the concluding portion the Cardinal announces "that it is not directly with the Divine assistance, to hold in the course of this year our provincial synod."

FIRE IN PIMLICO.—On Tuesday afternoon a fire of a most destructive character broke out in the stores of Mr. Keating, a pork-dealer, in Victoria-road, Pimlico, which resulted in the complete destruction of the premises. The premises were only partially insured. The damage is estimated at £7,000.

MORTALITY IN LONDON HOSPITALS, ASYLUMS, AND WORKHOUSES. —From official returns, it appears that in 1851 eleven of the general hospitals of London had 9763 resident patients, and that 2266 deaths took place in the year; the mortality on the population, therefore, more than 23 per cent. The patients only remained, on an average, 34 days in hospital; 29 857 passed through the wards; and the mortality was, therefore, 7·59 per cent. in the 34 days. About 59 in 100 who enter leave the London hospitals alive. The average number of lunatics in twenty asylums was 3748; the deaths in the year 1851 were 384; the annual rate of mortality was, therefore, 10·31 per cent. But they received 1768 years in these asylums, and only 3333 were discharged recovered, relieved, unrelieved, or dead: consequently 17 64 in 100 cases terminated fatally, and of 100 who enter, 82·36 leave the asylums alive. In the fever hospitals there were 11·37 deaths in 100 cases under treatment, and these 38 days, which limities that the rate of mortality was 10·84 deaths annually to every 100 patients constantly resident (100 occupied beds). In the consumption hospital 18·4 deaths occurred in 100 cases under treatment 76 days. The rate of mortality implies, therefore, that among a population consisting exclusively of persons labouring under consumption, the mortality would be 75·36 per cent. annually, as expressed by hospital experience. All the cases of illness in the army, slight as well as severe, are treated in the military hospits a; to the civil hospitals only cases of some severity are admitted; the mortality is, therefore, very different. Some of the differences in the mortality of other hospitals arise from the same cause; others are accidental.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—The births during the week ending on last Saturday, in the metropolitan districts, were—boys, 702; girls, 324: total, 1589 children. In the seven corresponding weeks of 1851 the average number was 1447. The deaths registered for the week were 1079 showing an increase of 102 on the previous week, in which the number was 970. By the official report it appears that the increase on the preceding seven weeks was considerable. The deaths of the resp ratory organs, which were fatal in the former week to 1 persons, in the latter to 203; phthisis, or consumption (in the tubercular class), destroyed 122 and 155 lives in the two successive weeks: was the deaths from pneumonia rose in the same period from 54 to 74, those from bronchitis decreased from 98 to 93. In connexion with these facts it seems necessary to remark, that the mean weekly temperature, which in January was generally above 40 deg., and in the first week of February was 47 deg., declined in the second week to 38·8 deg., and last week it was 39·8 deg.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—At the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, the mean daily reading of the barometer was above 30 in. on Sunday, Friday, and Saturday, and the mean of the week was 29·971 in. The mean daily temperature was above the average of corresponding days in ten years on the first four days, and below it on the last three. On Tuesday the mean temperature rose to 51·1 deg., and on Friday it fell to 31·6 deg., or 9·1 deg. less than 7 dec. below the average. The mean temperature of the week was 39·8 deg. In the former part of the week the wind blew from the west, and in the later from the north.

The Rev. W. Cadman, minister of Park Chapel, Chelsea, was presented on Saturday last to the important living of St. George, Southwark, by the Lord Chancellor

Messrs. Pocock and Elliott, of North Shields, on Friday week received information by letter from the only one of the crew saved of the total loss of the Providence brig, belonging to them, with the master and eight hands.

The hours of six in the morning and ten in the evening are regularly rung from the spire of St. Peter's Church, Dundee, by a chime of bells, produced by the application of water-power to a complicated piece of machinery.

The amount for the relief of the surviving sufferers at Holmfirth does not fall far short of £25,000. The following list may be taken as an approximation to the amount subscribed in some of the principal towns up to Thursday week:—London, £4000; Huddersfield, £2,000; Manchester, £2000; Leeds, £2000; Bradford, £1300; Halifax, £1700; York, £800, Dewsbury, £269; Barnsley, £370.

We are informed (says the Leeds Mercury) that one of the strictest kinds of convents is about to be established in Leeds. It is said that Lady Harris, widow of the late Sir William Harris, Envoy to Abyssinia, has recently become a convert to Catholicism, and has given the ratepayers a large sum of money, property, and the beautiful estate of Sea Cliff, in Haddingtonshire, to the Jesuits. It is understood that this lady, after performing a novitiate at an austere convent in Grenoble, France, is to found a similar institution in Leeds. Lady Harris is niece to Colonel Outram, so distinguished a British resident in Scinde.

The Rev. Charles L. Fisher, who some time since filled the post of chaplain to the Pope, but has since been officiating, conjointly with the Rev. W. J. Agar, at the Roman Catholic Church, Lyme Regis, announces his intention on the 18th instant, to adjure the Popish faith, and on the ensuing Sabbath to attend the parish church.

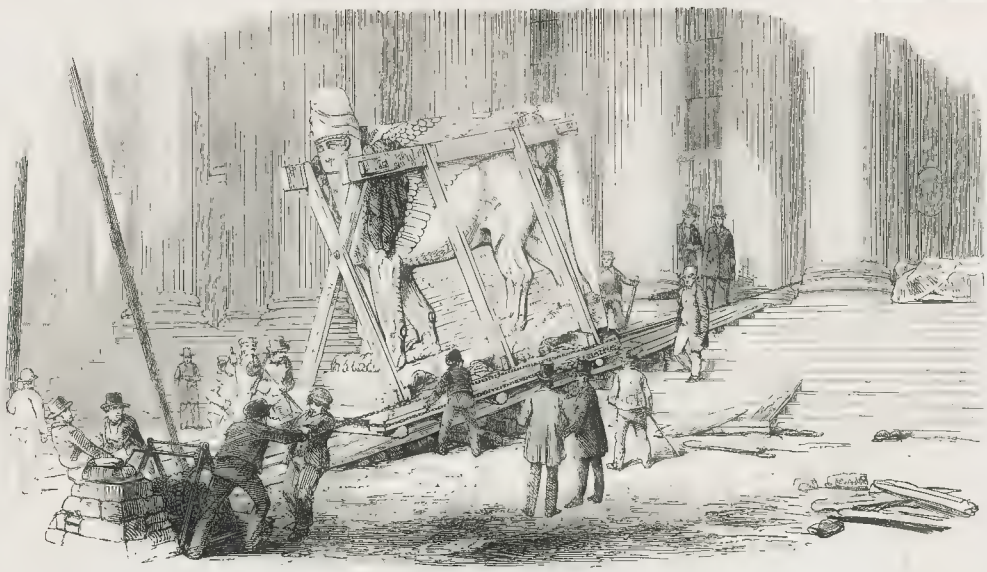
MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

All uncertainty regarding the formation of a new Ministry being at an end, the English funds opened on Monday with a firmer tone than they closed in first quoted at 97 to ¾, a rise of ¼ upon the last price of the previous Saturday; but after touching 97¾, closed at the first quotation. Little change occurred on Tuesday. Consols opened steadily (closing 97¾), but being off at the close of the day's prices. An advance of ¼ on Wednesday at the opening, was the only change during the day; and on Thursday the same quietude prevailed, 97¾ to ¾ being the current quotation. Bank Stock is firm at 2 to 2·5, and Exchequer Bills have advanced to 60 62. India Bonds are 73. The last official list gives prices for Reduced, 97¾ ⅝; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, 99¾ ¼, Long Annuities, 7⅞; Indescribed, 99¾; India Bonds, 71 73; Exchequer Bills (large), 60s to 63s pm.; Consols for account, 97¾ to ⅞.

Business was unimportant in the Foreign funds on Monday, but the Market was tolerably firm. Brazilian Bonds realised 99⅛; but leaving off at the previous



RECEPTION OF NINEVEH SCULPTURES AT THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

RECEPTION OF NINEVEH SCULPTURES AT THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

Amongst the recent arrivals from Nimroud, the most striking and important is a colossal Lion, the weight of which is upwards of ten tons. This Lion was once a guardian at the side of a door, and it will be located in a similar position in the British Museum, in the hall dedicated to the Nineveh Sculptures.

The subject of our Engraving represents the Lion in its transit from the courtyard in front of the Museum into the building, and shows the inclined plane up which it was drawn, and the workmen busily engaged at their labour. The piece of sculpture itself was brought from the Docks on a truck drawn by eleven horses, and when in the courtyard was lifted from the carriage and placed securely on a massive framework of wood; being shored up on either side, as in our Engraving, to keep it from swaying over whilst it was being dragged to its place. This operation was skilfully performed, and the process of dragging up the incline to a level landing under the portico did not occupy more than one hour. The Lion was placed on its bed on the framework in such a manner that during its being moved it was going backwards: this was done to avoid the necessity of turning the huge mass when in the hall of the Museum, so that, in fact, it was dragged at once to the spot it was intended it should ultimately occupy, when lifted from the framework and rollers which had taken it to its resting-place. The Lion, in its general form, resembles other examples with which the public are now familiar; but we believe it is the largest monolith which has reached England from the buried city of the East.

The vessel Apprentice not only brought the above antiquities from Bussorah, but also a considerable quantity of ancient marbles from the same quarter for Sir John Guest.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR MARCH.

Commencer à commencement, it is a matter of difficulty to recommend this month as morning toilet, all the attention being centred on ball-dresses. The Carnival absorbs public attention, and dancing reigns supreme. Nothing new has appeared for out of doors. We must, therefore, be content with the ball-dress as a guide for the London season about to begin. A few costume balls have also diverted the attention; but there was no costume of particular note. The most remarkable, and also of the best taste, are the exact costumes of those countries which yet possess one, and are not overwhelmed by the execrable dress-coat. The ateliers of artists who have had the good luck to visit these fortunate countries generally furnish authorities for these balls. The Oriental costumes are the most recherché. The ladies of a ball at which we were present were nearly all dressed in this fashion, and not many repented of the change. The men, particularly, could hardly be recognised. The ball toilets are remarkable for the quantity of gold and silver with which they are composed. At the President's ball, particularly, this fashion was seen in all its splendour. It is, however, a difficult thing to arrange the ornaments with taste; and we perceive, with regret, that fresh flowers and rich and airy feathers no longer find a place in toilets, or, at least, only maintain their places with gold or silver. We give a few details of some of the most graceful and most remarkable dresses at the fêtes of the jours gras.

Two flounces of taffeta, two petticoats of net: the first flounce, which was made of taffeta, was cut out into teeth, edged with a small gathered satin ribbon; the second of net had teeth, edged with rings, linked one with th other; they were alternately of gold and white silk, that of the middle larger than the others, which diminished as they reached the upper part of the teeth. The Louis XV. body was trimmed in the same manner with blond, retained by rings of gold and silk. The head-dress was composed of bunches of gold ribbon and gold grapes. This toilet, without being overcharged with gold, may be considered as the type of the toilets of this kind. We should observe, en passant, that flat sleeves are not tolerated, they are longer this year than last, and also more covered with ornaments. Antique silks have just been made with large stripes, and coloured; and the richness of these splendid stuffs could hardly be increased. A few days since dresses appeared with patterns of flowers woven with gold. Unless they be covered with pearls and diamonds, as of yore, we do not think that their splendour could be increased.

The dresses ornamented with gold require head-dresses of the same, such as corn-ears, beads, gold nets, ribbons with buckles of gold, &c. Flowers are even made in the same manner. Sprigs of silver are adapted to the briar rose. Silver clematis is intermingled with white or grey feathers. Head-dresses are also made with gold lace; and golden sequins are mixed with the hair, and are rolled behind with the tresses.

The new spring fashions are already absorbing attention. Are the dresses to be longer or shorter? that is the question; the bodies open or closed? But the splendour of the present hour promises much for the ensuing spring season.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 548.—VOL. XX. SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1852. [SIXPENCE. { WITH SUPPLEMENT, GRATIS.

THE NEW MINISTERS, AND THEIR EXPLANATIONS.

THE two most important members of the new Administration have severally addressed the public in reference to their future policy—the one through the medium of the House of Peers, the other through the less dignified, but equally effective, medium of the electors of the county of Bucks. The Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer are both in a difficult position. Their party and the country expect them to say much; but true discretion warns them, that the less they say under present circumstances, the better for their future prospects. Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli seem to rely greatly upon persuading the public that they are ex necessitate in office; that a Ministry of which they were not part was not only inadvisable, but impossible; and that the alternative offered to their patriotism was to accept office with all its heavy risks, inconveniences, and responsibilities, or to leave the Queen without a Government. This is, perhaps, a correct view of the case; although it might be urged on the other hand, that the Russell Administration having died of an accidental defeat at the hands principally of its own supporters, another Liberal Ministry, less encumbered with a bad character, and formed of men of more energy and wider sympathies, not descended from Lord John Russell's great-great-grandmother, might have been tried, if Lord Derby had chosen to be coy. But Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli have an object—and a very important one—in reading or forcing the public to the conclusion that their advent was inevitable. The more strongly the conviction is felt that between Lord Derby and a collapse of Government there was no choice, the less reason there is for asking such a Government for programmes or pledges. Either Lord Derby is the Minister of necessity, to do his best as circumstances may warrant; or he is the Minister of the Protectionists, bound to restore the Corn-laws. It is his policy to appear to be the one, rather than to be the other; and, accordingly, we notice in his Lordship's eloquent speech to the House of Lords, as well as in Mr. Disraeli's curt and emphatic address to the electors of Buckinghamshire, that "Necessity has no (Corn) law," and that the Protectionists are not to expect Protection, unless under certain circumstances which are not likely to happen. Lord Derby asserts his opinion, that, as long as there is a general system of imposing duties upon foreign imports, the article of corn ought not to be an exception. In other words, he thinks that if we levy a duty upon tobacco, we ought to levy a duty upon bread, and that the wine of the rich man and the loaf of the poor are equally fair objects for the tax-collector. No one can imagine that his Lordship means to abolish all import duties upon articles of consumption—upon the luxuries as well as the necessaries of life; or that because bread is free he will forego the tea, coffee, and sugar duties, or those upon wine, spirits, and tobacco. His Lordship's tendencies do not run in that direction—they would be inconvenient to himself and to the country if they did; but he thinks we ought to derive a revenue from bread. At the same time, his Lordship, while holding this opinion, "thinks the question is one which can only be solved by reference to the well understood and clearly expressed opinion of the intelligent portion of the community." We think that those who clamour and have long clamoured for a fixed duty upon corn, and who may have hailed the accession to power of the Derby Administration with the hope that their wish would at last be gratified, will derive but small comfort from this confession of the Prime Minister. The most influential portion of the public have already pronounced, and perhaps Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli would admit, if it were convenient to do so, that influence and intelligence in this country are so indissolubly bound together as to be nearly synonymous. He must, indeed, be a sanguine friend of the Corn-laws, who expects that, after such qualification as he appends to his opinion, Lord Derby will attempt to tax the bread of the people.

Mr. Disraeli's address to the electors of Buckinghamshire seems at first sight to be a little less guarded than the speech of the Prime Minister. But when the address is investigated, it will be found to afford no more hope for the Protectionists, or that portion of them who wish to tax the poor man's loaf, than the carefully studied manifesto of the Premier. The Chancellor of the Exchequer boldly asserts that "in office he will carry out the principles which he advocated while in opposition." But the phrase will only sound portentously and joyously in the ears of those Protectionists who do not read the parliamentary debates, or who but read them to forget. It is but thirteen months ago since Mr. Disraeli, in opposition, finally abandoned the cause, we will not say of Protection generally, but of the bread-tax particularly. We cited last week the passage in his speech in which he distinctly asserted that he would not seek to restore the Corn-laws, but would devote his efforts to other measures by the operation of which the corn producers of this country might be enabled to adapt themselves profitably to the altered circumstances in which the repeal of the Corn-laws had placed them. His address to his constituents of this week, if compared with his speeches of last session and the session before, will neither be found to contradict them nor to hold out any promise, or shadow of a promise, to attempt the restoration of the Corn-laws. Let not the farmers deceive themselves with vain hopes. Their friends are in power; but a bread-tax is as impossible for them to restore, as it was for Sir Robert Peel to continue.

Yet, if the Ministry be really the Ministry of necessity that it would fain appear, and as politicians of more than one important party in the State are well contented that it should for a season be considered, there is much good that it can effect, both for the agriculturists and for all other classes of the community. If there be any burdens unjustly laid upon the shoulders of the cultivators of the soil, from which other classes are either wholly or partially exempt, Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli may, without touching the Corn-law question, set about their relief with all the authority and facility which possession of power will afford them. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, when out of office, was often a Free-trader, in spite of himself, and thought the labouring classes were as much entitled to cheap beer as they are to cheap bread. He denounced the injustice of the Malt-tax, and claimed Free Trade for, as well as against, the farmers. If he can repeal the Malt-tax, and devise a substitute for it that shall not press unfairly upon the commerce and industry of the country, he will perform a public service, for which, if the farmers are grateful, the hard-working farm labourers and all the artisans of the great towns and cities will perhaps have more reason to be so. Any competent Minister, be his antecedents what they may, who will consider the Corn-laws as a settled question, not again to be disturbed, and will devote his energies and abilities to the revision of our whole system of taxation, will entitle himself to the respect and gratitude of the public. It is not only the Malt-tax but the unequal and impolitic Tea-duties, and, worse than all, the vexatious and mischievous Excise duties upon cleanliness of body and purity of mind, that call for the strong hand of a wise Minister to abolish them for ever. The public is not as yet informed of the opinions of the new Chancellor on all of these points. It knows that out of office he had some crotchets which in office he may, perhaps, forget; but it does not know what he thinks of the Tea-duties, that prevent the legitimate expansion of our trade with one of the wealthiest nations on the globe, nor of the stupid Excise duty levied upon soap. It has reason to believe, however, that he will be so far the friend of the farmer and the labourer as to do his best to get rid of the Malt-tax, and that he is sufficiently aware of the manifold evils, literary, political, and commercial, caused by the taxes on paper, books, and newspapers, as to be well inclined to aid in the good work of their removal. The abolition of any one of these taxes by Mr. Disraeli would atone for a multitude of past sins, provided always that he let the Corn-laws as they are. No merit, however brilliant, no service, however splendid, could atone for the mischief that would be caused by any further attempt to enhance by artificial means the price of corn. The mind of the country is quite made up on this point. "The well understood and clearly expressed opinion of the intelligent portion of the community" says, "Not a Bread-tax!" The great meeting of the Anti-Corn-law League held on Tuesday, and at which £32,000 and upwards were subscribed in little more than half an hour, portends the coming storm. He will not be a courageous but a rash Minister who will shut his eyes against such symptoms of the popular will. The Anti-Corn-law League are in earnest. They demand nothing but the maintenance of the existing law. They are our best conservatives. It will be an evil day for the country, when such a body of men, backed as they are sure to be by all the immense multitude who are prospering under a free-trade system, and "who know the reason why," shall demand something more; and when they shall ask, not for the maintenance of a law, but for the abolition, not of one law, but of many. We trust, however, that such a calamity will be averted.

THE NEW LORD CHANCELLOR.

THE Right Hon. Edward Burtenshaw Sugden, Baron St. Leonard's and Lord High Chancellor of England, is a remarkable instance, among those in which this country takes such just pride, of a man advancing by sure and steady progress to exalted fortune, rank, and fame, through his own great ability and indefatigable industry. Called to the bar in 1807, with but little external interest to support him, and scarcely aught but himself to rely on, Edward Burtenshaw Sugden soon made his talents bring him into notice. He had not been a barrister a year when the first edition of his celebrated treatise on the law of "Powers," an intricate and difficult subject connected with the transmission of property, arrested the attention of the profession. The book had eminent success. His even more famous treatise, on the "Law of Vendors and Purchasers of Estates," followed. Both works have gone through edition after edition, and are to this day regularly revised and kept in date by the untiring assiduity of their author. The result of two such legal productions is not to be wondered at, when it became known that Mr. Sugden added to his capabilities of writing marked qualifications as a shrewd and eloquent advocate. He obtained a practice soon considerable—subsequently enormous. It is, indeed, reported, and, we believe, with accuracy, that, during some years his was the largest income ever earned by a member of the English bar. In 1829 Mr. Sugden became a King's counsel and a bencher of Lincoln's-inn. His political career he commenced as M.P. for Weymouth, and he speedily showed himself a strenuous supporter of the Tory party. In June, 1829, he was appointed Solicitor-General, and continued so until the accession of the Whigs to power, in November, 1830. He was also knighted in 1829. During the agitated period of the discussion of the Reform Bill, Sir Edward Sugden stood prominently among the most active opponents of the measure. Yet, though an anti-reformer in this respect, Sir Edward advocated some very judicious changes. The five statutes which he brought in and passed while Solicitor-General have effected some of the most valuable amendments in Chancery jurisprudence. In 1835 Sir Edward Sugden was named Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and a Privy Councillor. His tenure of office lasted but three months, and in 1837 he came back to the House of Commons as member of Parliament for Ripon. In 1841 he resumed the seals of Ireland, and most ably fulfilled the duties of Chancellor there until 1846, when he and his party went out of power. Since that period until now Sir Edward has remained in retirement, but not in inactivity. The new editions of his works which have recently appeared have rendered his leisure scarcely less valuable to the profession than his official occupation Besides his treatises on "Powers" and on "Vendors," Sir Edward Sugden has produced many other legal essays. Among them there is one written in a familiar and popular style, entitled "Letters to a Man of Property," which is of such wide and admirable utility, that every one in the happy condition of having an estate ought to read and become master of its contents. The book, too, affords a fine and, not being legally professional, a generally comprehensible specimen of the clear and sagacious mind of its author. Another remarkable production of his is his pamphlet against the oft-mooted registry of deeds.

The last few days have seen this great lawyer attaining the summit of that profession which owes so much to his labours and his talents. He is now Lord High Chancellor, and a Peer of the Realm, with the graceful title of Baron St. Leonard's. His Lordship has taken his seat on the Chancery Bench in a crowded court, amongst whom the whole leading equity bar, which, whatever might be the diversity of political feeling, was there to welcome the advent of a judge so thorough a master of as art. Lord St. Leonard's accepts the seals at a momentous period, when the cry from without is loud for the destruction of the old feudal and defective architecture that girds the fabric of equity. His coming may prove auspicious; for the eagle eye and comprehensive mind of such a lawyer can, without arresting, guide the proposed demolition, so as to assure permanent security as well as beneficial change in the eventual work of restoration.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

SWEARING IN OF THE NEW LORD CHANCELLOR.

The new Lord Chancellor of England, Lord St. Leonard's, was introduced to his seat upon the woolsack by Lord Lyndhurst and Lord Brougham. The Bishop of Norwich officiated on the occasion. The oaths were administered by Mr. Edmunds, the clerk at the table. Amongst the Peers present were the Earl of Derby, the Earl of Eglinton, the ex-Chancellor, Lord Truro, the Marquis of Salisbury, the Marquis of Exeter, and Lord Redesdale.

The noble and learned Lord was attended by Garter King at Arms, Sir Augustus Clifford and Mr. Palmer, the Usher and Deputy-Usher of the Black Rod. The public generally were not admitted during the ceremony.

The Lord Chancellor afterwards proceeded to hear some Scotch appeals.

His Lordship took his seat on the Bench in the Court of Chancery with the usual ceremonies, on Monday.

THE NEW GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS.—The Earl of Derby has appointed Lieut.-Colonel the Hon. Edward Wilbraham to be his private secretary. Mr. C. W. Stronge, of the Treasury, is also actua as the second private secretary to the Premier. The Right Hon. S. H. Walpole has appointed as his private secretary at the Home Office Mr Spencer Perceval, grandson of Mr. Perceval, the Prime Minister of George III. The Earl of Malmesbury has appointed Mr. George Harris as his Lordship's private secretary at the Foreign Office. Sir John Pakington has appointed his son, Mr. John Slaney Pakington, as his private secretary at the Colonial Office. Mr. J. H. Cole, of the Treasury, is appointed private secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Duke of Northumberland has appointed the Hon. F. S. P. Pelham to be his private secretary at the Admiralty.

Sir John Trollope on Wednesday entered upon the duties of the office vacated by Mr. Bates at the Poor-law Board.

A large body of the Liberal members of the House of Commons have been invited to meet Lord John Russell on the 11th inst., with a view to some consultation and determination on the present position of public affairs.

The Morning Herald says that it was generally rumoured on Tuesday, at the clubs, that Mr. Vollers, at the pers nal request of Lord John Russell, had consented to withdraw the motion of which, when sparring under the effects of Lord Derby's statement, he had, in a hasty moment, given notice.

The Opinione of Turin quotes a letter from Milan, of the 25th ult., stating that the Austrian police had r ceived orders to examine the tickets and reclamations of all travellers. It is still known if the other Lombard passports, which were given only for Piedmont, are to be examined more than twenty-four hours in coming.

It is anticipated that two ships of the Channel fleet will be undertaken for repairs at Chatham dockyard. Two steamers besides will be extended as far as Garrison Rocks, the effect of which step would be very much to add to the security of the dockyard. The fort at the eastern entrance of the dockyard is to be under the orders of the Admiralty, who will place at once new guns on one of the present inefficient ones: some of them will be adapted for throwing red-hot shot

A few days ago as a coast-guard of the name of Fitzgerald was crossing from one side of the Grando Harbour, Cork, to the other, in a yawl, in which were six men, an old woman, and five children, it was upset; when three of the men, the old woman, and the five children were drowned. Fitzgerald made every exertion to save his children but without success. He swam a considerable distance trying to support one of his children, whose clothes he caught in his teeth, but the child was washed away from him by a wave, and perished with the rest.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

THURSDAY, March 4th.

The contrast between the last week of the Carnival and the first week of Lent is striking. Dancing in the salons is seldom to be met with here after Ash Wednesday; but in former years the place of balls was supplied by musical soirees. Up to this time we have, with one or two exceptions, a complete dearth of amusements of every kind. The first exception is a concert given by the Countess Kalergi, at which the tuniés were not a little surprised at seeing M. de Persigny, the Minister of the Interior, and the right hand of the Elysée, in company with Count Molé, the Duke de Broglie, and Mdme. D'Haussonville. This well-intended attempt at reconciliation has, however, been a complete fiasco. The second exception is a half artistical banquet given by the new Brazilian Minister here (Marquis de Lisbon) to several notabilities of the diplomatic and literary world, at the Trois Frères, in the Palais Royal. Among the guests were M. Thalberg, the celebrated pianist, who is about to make a musical tour in America, commencing by the Brazils; and MM. de Ribeiro, and Pereira de Silva, both well known in London fashionable circles The remainder of the company consisted chiefly of the Brazilian nobility in Paris. Lablache was to have been present, but he arrived in town from Italy only on the following day.

Since the 16th of last month, 1500 pictures, statues, &c., intended for the Exhibition at the Palais Royal, have been sent in to be examined by the jury, who decide, without appeal, whether their merit entitle them to admission.

The King of Holland, whose munificent patronage of artists and musicians is well known in England, has just granted gold medals to M. Batta, the well-known violinist; M. Scribe and M. St. George, the librettists. The value of this medal is 500 florins (£48); it bears on one side the effigy of the Monarch, and on the reverse the following appropriate Latin inscription:—"Bene merentibus arte et ingenio."

An importation from the banks of the Thames is lately viable, to wit, shops in Regent-street, gin-palaces, not less than a dozen of which have been opened in various quarters of the town. They are quite equal in richness to those in London, and got up with far more taste; they are, indeed, equal in their decorations to the richest cafés on the Boulevards. Here, as we have, luckily, no gin, they are devoted to the sale of cheap wine and eau de vie, which, in adulteration and deleterious qualities of all kinds, fully equal the worst abominations to be found at similar places in London. They do not seem, however, to take so well among the lower classes here as with you, and it is to be hoped these speculations will turn out a failure.

This week's obituary contains the names of two or three remarkable persons—two connected closely with the drama, M. Merle and M. Seveste The former was the oldest dramatic critic on the Paris press, and his opinions have ever been respected, as based on a thorough knowledge of the science of the drama, excellent taste, and unerring soundness of judgment. His funeral, which took place on Sunday, was attended by a host of literary and artistic celebrities, among them General Magnan, Baron Taylor, Jules Janin, Mr. Poole (the English dramatic writer), Mdlle. Rachel, Mdlle. Georges, &c. An affecting address was delivered over the grave by M. Jules Janin, who paid a graceful homage to the qualities of the deceased both as a writer and as a gentleman. M. Merle was a Juliusk Legitimist. Seveste was the director of the Opéra National, and was carried off in a very short time by an attack of paralysis. This gentleman had all his life been connected with the theatres. A few years since he distinguished himself as Government Commissioner at the Français, and had contrived to carry on with some success the turbulent lyrical theatre under circumstances the most unfavourable. Another death is also recorded, of an individual who also attained a sort of celebrity, though of a different kind—Père Nicolet, the proprietor of Le Petit Rampumeau, a popular guinguette, or eating and dancing-house, near the Barrière Blanche, whose loss is mourned by a far more numerous class and with more sincerity than generally attend many a demise in a much more exalted station. Père Nicolet, as he was familiarly called, was one of those noble-hearted and truly benevolent men who are sometimes to be found in the lowest ranks, among all classes, and thousands of the working men and their families looked up to him as a protector and a friend. He had amassed a very large fortune, dying worth more than a million of francs (£40,000) in the funds, besides his immense establishment. The customers of which were counted by thousands rather than hundreds, the consumption being such at twenty barrels of wine and as many sheep and calves per diem. Père Nicolet arrived in Paris a quarter of a century ago with a couple of francs in his pocket, and was first employed as a hackney-coachman. His good conduct and civility enabled him to save a few napoleons, with which he bought a single barrel of wine, which he sold under a shed, on the very spot where he afterwards built the immense restaurant de 500 couverts, of which he was the proprietor. Such was the beginning of his well-earned fortune. Seveste was the noble face and figure, not unlike those of Lablache, might be seen until within three days of his death, presiding over his well-filled cauldrons. Requiescat.

The libraries of the Palais Royal and Neuilly are announced for sale, and the catalogue has been issued, and is perused with no little curiosity by amateurs. These collections were formed originally of such works as remained in the famous libraries of the Count de Penthièvre, de Toulouse, and the Dowager Duchess of Orleans, after their destruction, in 1793, by the amis de la nation. They have been greatly increased since 1830, in consequence of the numerous purchases made by Louis Philippe, or by his subscriptions to costly works, which would never have seen the light but for his munificent support. Thus at the coming sale much will be found to suit every taste—complete sets of classic works on science, art, and literature. Among the curiosities there is a remarkable collection of chivalry romances in Spanish, English, French, and Italian, which the Count de Toulouse had formed at Rambouillet; among them there is a manuscript on parchment, of the 13th century, containing "Le Romance of Yvain Knighte of ye Rounde Table;" and another manuscript on vellum, of the 14th century, the title of which is as follows:—"Chi commenchent li Regret de Guillaume le Comte de Hayanau père à la Royne d'Angleterre et à la Comtesse de Julers—Chest Romans de Castelain de Coucl." There is also another manuscript of a much later date, but still extremely curious. It is an abridgment in verse of the famous "Roman de la Rose," by Guillaume de Sala, the librarian of François Premier; his dedication concludes by the following quaint lines:—

Et neantmoins que ce soit escrit vain,
Il vous plaira d'excuser l'escrivain,
Vostre Sala très-humble en vostre chambre,
Qui vous requiest que de lui vous remembre.

There are also many other works of equal interest, to which I intend to revert when the sale takes place in May of them, unfortunately, were sadly mutilated in February, 1848. Leaves were torn from valuable works, as, for instance, the proof edition of the "Galleries of the Ducal and Pitti palaces of Florence," six leaves of which were not wholly destroyed, but torn in the middle. The perpetrators of this act of vandalism had the audacity to sign their names on the destroyed pages, followed by the date "24 Fevrier, 1848" Tempus edax, homo edacior!

FRANCE.

The sole topic of interest during the week was the election of members to the new Corps Législatif, which commenced on Sunday, and was brought to a close on Monday evening; and, although the official declaration of the numbers has not been made known, it has been ascertained that the tactics of the Government to have its own candidates alone returned have been generally successful throughout the departments, in forty-seven of which, according to the latest accounts which have reached us, all the Government candidates, without an exception, have been returned

In Paris some little stir of free action seems to have survived, for General Cavaignac has been returned on a position to the Government candidate, in the third electoral district of the capital, which consisted chiefly by the commercial classes; and M. Carnot, the opposition candidate in the fourth electoral district, which is the stronghold of the operatives, obtained a majority over his competitors, but not the full number required by law; so he will have to stand another election, when, it is thought, he is certain to be re-elected. M. Carnot was a member of the Provisional Government in 1848, and is one of the most advanced of the extreme Republicans.

The autocratic legislation by means of decrees, which has formed so conspicuous a feature in Louis Napoleon's Government since the coup d'état, is still maintained with Russian rigour. One of these decrees just issued renders imperative the retirement of the judges of the Court of Cassation a seventy-five years of age, and the other judges at seventy years of age. This edict will displace throughout the country about five hundred judges of the greater and minor courts, and thus enable Louis Napoleon to crowd the bench with his partisans, while it destroys the independence of the judges by doing away with their irremovability. Another decree abrogates the law of August, 1848, regarding the organisation of Bankruptcy Courts; whilst a third decree appoints a great number of officers of National Guards. A plan of a medal for soldiers is struck out for acts of merit, and which may be worn along with the cross of the Legion of Honour. The medal is to bear the profile of the President himself on one side, and the words "Valeur et Discipline" on the other, surmounted by an eagle. The cost of this medal, with 100f. a year to which the possessor is to be entitled, is to be defrayed out of the confiscated Orleans property

The trial of M. Bocher, for circulating a letter of thanks from the Princes of Orleans to the executors of Louis Philippe, and the other documents relating to the contemplated law proceedings against the confiscation decree, which we noticed last week, without the printer's name attached, as fixed by law, was closed on Wednesday. He was found guilty, and sentenced to pay a fine of 500f.

The general feeling of condemnation with which the late decree of confiscation against the Orleans property has been regarded has made the Government recognise the necessity of attempting to remove the bad impression; and, accordingly, it has got published "A Reply to the Protest of the Executors of the Will of the late King Louis Philippe" against the decree of the 22d of January. The document is very voluminous, but its arguments are of the most fallacious description.

On Thursday the General Council of the Bank of France voted to reduce the rate of discount to three per cent.

By order of Louis Napoleon, 30 political prisoners have been discharged at Montpellier, 20 at Dijon, and 24 at Bourges.

PRUSSIA.

Accounts from Berlin, dated the 2d inst., state that the sufferings of the poor are so severe in the several states of the Zollverein, from the scarcity of provisions, that the Prussian Government have decreed that all corn, flour, and vegetables imported therein shall be exempted from the payment of duties until the 31st of August next.

SWITZERLAND.

The unsatisfactory relations at present existing between France and the Swiss Cantons, because the Federal Government of the latter refuses to yield to the most imperious dictation of the Government of Louis Napoleon to expel all French refugees out of the Swiss territory, remain unaltered. France is supported by Austria in her demands, for the latter power looks with an eye of displeasure on the maintenance at her frontiers of an asylum for the numerous disaffected bodies of her own subjects whom she expels; and the apprehensions entertained by many of the friends of Switzerland on the subject go so far as to anticipate an occupation of the Swiss territory by French and Austrian troops, and probably a partition of it after the manner of Poland in the last century! But such a fate for the land of Tell seems impossible.

UNITED STATES.

Accounts from New York to the 21st ult., notice the presentation, by Mr. J. F. Crampton, to the President of the Republic of the letter recalling Sir H. Bulwer, and his own credentials as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Great Britain to the United States' Government.

Kossuth, we find, is still busy in the western states making speeches and receiving donations. The Hungarian certificates, payable on the re-establishment of the Magyar chief as Governor (!) in Hungary, continue to be issued, though the demand for such an investment was but limited. The unpopularity of everything Austrian, however, had been recently man.fested at Mobile, when Chevalier Hubner, the Austrian Chargé, was there. He was "charivaried" at his hotel by a large crowd, consisting mostly of Germans. Kossuth had sent a letter of thanks to Congress for his reception at Washington. A motion to print the letter in Senate was carried by a majority of only 1—21 to 20.

The Spanish Consul had been insulted at New Orleans—flag torn down.

A German Congress had taken place at Cincinnati, to raise money for a German revolution.

A commercial treaty had been concluded between the United States and Persia.

Two fatal accidents had occurred on the Erie Railroad—five or seven killed.

Property to the value of 200,000 dollars had been destroyed by the breaking up of the ice in the Ohio river, below Louisville.

The agitation of slaves for California was becoming more extensive.

From Central America we learn, that on the 4th ult. a fire occurred at San Juan de Nicaragua, destroying part of the town. Another revolution had broken out in Nicaragua.

The Mexican advices notice a severe gale at Vera Cruz, which occasioned a loss of a million of dollars.

The Supreme Government of the State of Honduras has issued a decree relative to the occupation of the Rio Romano by Sir James Green, in her Majesty's ship Bermuda. The decree declares such proceedings to be unjust and unlawful, and authorises the punishment of the aggressors.

Cholera was on the decline in the island of Jamaica at the last date (the 10th ult.) Details of the riot at Kingston on the 2d state that 500 American recruits landed from the steamer Falcon, and a drunken quarrel ensued, which was, however, terminated by the British troops.

From California the latest date is the 21st of January, but there is nothing of interest in the advices. The weather was fine, and both miners and farmers were in good spirits. The late rains and increased operations had taken place on the high land dry diggings, from which immense quantities of gold were being washed. Quartz mining was progressing favourably. Several valuable silver mines had been discovered on the western boundary of Chihuahua, and on the eastern boundary of Sonora.

INDIA.

A telegraphic despatch from Trieste in anticipation of the Overland Mail communicates advices from Bombay, dated the 3d ult., by which we learn that a "Burmese war" has been entered upon, arising out of the differences with the Government of Ava, noticed in our last Indian intelligence, which it was then thought were likely to be adjusted amicably.

This agreeable expectation has, however, been disappointed. The new Viceroy arrived from the capital of Ava, at Rangoon, on the 4th of Jan., and refused to receive deputations from the British Commodore; he also forbade communication between the shore and the vessels, insulted the British flag, and erected batteries and stockades below the town to prevent the departure of any of the vessels of the British Commodore. The British Commodore in consequence proclaimed a blockade of the mouth of the Irawaddy. On the 9th the Viceroy wrote to the Commodore to allow the passage of the river. The Proserpine, Fox, and Hermes were attacked by the batteries in passing; but they replied to the fire, destroyed the fortifications, and killed nearly 300 persons.

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH AND UNIFORM OR RAILWAY TIME.—The Electric Telegraph Company are now introducing a novel and beautiful system for distributing and establishing correct Greenwich or uniform time throughout the country. For this purpose [illegible] are being laid down over the railway and through Greenwich-park to the Observatory, and through the country of the South Eastern Railway the wires are being carried from thence, at the rate of [illegible] of the Astronomer Royal, to the Telegraph office, in the Strand, on the dome of which, facing St. Martin's church, [illegible] elevated pole, similar to that on the top of the Observatory at Greenwich, is to be erected, on which every day [illegible] a large black ball, [illegible] feet six inches in diameter, [illegible] pole, [illegible] minutes to [illegible] o'clock, and [illegible] to the pole, [illegible] Strand [illegible] to the pole, [illegible] Telegraph Company, and well known to collectors will be that [illegible] of the Britannia Bridge.

The Peninsular and Oriental Company's steam-ship Haddington, which left Suez on the 8th of February, [illegible] back to the East India Company's steam packet Akbar, in consequence of the fracture of her intermediate shaft, which rendered her engines useless. She will be detained at Suez until a new one is sent from either England or Calcutta. It was expected that the mails and passengers she had on board from Bombay would proceed about the 20th of February by the Akbar; but all the others, for Calcutta, &c., will have to wait for the Haddington and she before the beginning of March.

It is not, as was reported, Mr. Serjeant Kinglake, but his relative, Mr. A. W. Kinglake, of the Chancery Bar, who has offered himself as a candidate for the representation of Bridgwater.

REVIVAL OF THE ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE.

The conviction of the leading advocates of Free-Trade—that the bare suspicion existing in the public mind of its being possible to re-impose, under the administration of the Earl of Derby, protective duties on the import of foreign corn, would paralyse the foreign trade of Great Britain, and exercise upon our commerce generally that baneful influence which ever attends doubt and uncertainty—has determined the adoption, on their part, of a course which they regard as calculated to precipitate a speedy solution of all doubts and difficulties in the matter by the re-organisation of the Anti-Corn-law League, and the immediate revival of the Free-trade agitation which had its termination in the repeal of the Corn-laws by the late Sir Robert Peel, in 1846.

It is thus considered that, on commercial grounds alone, they are called upon to take this step; but it will be seen from Mr. Cobden's speech, which we give below, and in which the honourable member for the West Riding takes a rapid view of the existing political "situation," that any delay in the settlement of the question is regarded as most perilous to the complete maintenance of the unrestricted commercial policy inaugurated in 1846, and that the "breathing time" which is prayed for the Derby Cabinet, to enable its members to steady their position in office, and give the country an opportunity of seeing whether it is not possible to form a Government out of other elements than those presented by the "family clique" that has just resigned, would only have the effect of rendering it very possible for a Government "Protectionist" in disposition, such as that of the Earl of Derby is assumed to be, to re-impose a limited duty on foreign corn, apparently for the purpose of revenue, but, in reality, for the benefit of the agricultural classes.

This is the opinion of Mr. Cobden and of his former collaborateurs in the Anti-Corn-law League; and it is to obviate such a result of the present political crisis that they have again called into existence that powerful organisation to which even the abilities and experience of the late Sir R. Peel had to bow.

The meeting for the re-organisation of the League was held at Newall's-buildings, Manchester, on Tuesday, under the presidency of Mr. G. Wilson, formerly chairman of the League; and the tone and character of the assembly may be inferred from the fact that at the close of the proceedings no less a sum than £37,500 was subscribed in twenty-five minutes, being, as the chairman announced, at the rate of more than £1000 per minute.

The following are amongst the subscribers:—Mr. R. Platt, £1000; Kershaw, Leese, and Co., £1000; Mr. R. Mackey, £1000; R. Lees and Sons, £1000; a Manchester and Sons, £1000; A. and S. Henry and Co., £1000; William Bailey and Brothers, £1000; Mr. W. Brown, M.P., £1000; J. and N. Phillips and Co., £1000; T. Ashton and Sons, £1000; Mr. Thomas Thomason, £1000; Mr. R. Ashton, £1000; Mr. James Chadwick, £1000; Mr. Titus Salt, £1000; Mr. R. Milligan, M.P., £1000; making altogether 15 subscriptions of £1000 each. Fifteen subscriptions of £500 were announced; also two of £300, six of £250, five of £200, one of £150, 18 of £100, 10 of £500, besides six smaller sums.

At the outset, when the chair was taken, there were on the platform—Mr. Cobden, M.P.; Mr. Bright, M.P.; Mr. Gibson, M.P.; Mr. Henry, M.P.; Mr. J. Heywood, M.P.; Mr. Brotherton, M.P.; Mr. Kershaw, M.P.; Mr. C. Hindley, M.P.; Mr. R. Milligan, M.P.; Mr. H. Ashworth, of Turton; Mr. James Wycolley, Manchester; Mr. John Marshall, Horsforth Hall; Mr. M. Fielden, Todmorden, &c.

After a few prefatory remarks from the chairman, introducing the business of the day,

Mr. Cobden, M.P., who was greeted with enthusiastic cheers, proposed the first resolution; viz.—

That an Administration having been formed committed by every pledge that can bind the honour of public men to attempt to reimpose a duty on corn, it is resolved that the Anti-Corn-law League be reconstituted, under the rules and regulations of that body, as formerly organised.

The hon. gentleman spoke as follows:—

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen,—As there are many gentlemen here who have come from a distance, some of them representing large bodies of constituents, from whom we should like to hear some remarks, I shall address you in as short a compass as possible, that I may not prevent others from being heard on this occasion. When we, in 1846, resolved to lay down our arms, and to commit suicide upon the Anti-Corn-law League, it was said, even by our enemies, that the fairest and best of all our conduct was the close of our existence. ("Hear," and a laugh.) Everybody admitted that the Anti-Corn-law League had kept with with the world at large; that we had not sought to divert that influence and power which we had obtained by the successful advocacy of one question into the means of aggrandizing any individual or any body of men. (Hear, hear.) I may say for myself, and I think I may also for all those around me, that as any object we acquired was merely the means essential in placing a Government in power—a position which I believe it has been found that many men born to took advantage of to carry out personal or selfish ends. (Hear, hear.) I say this, because, in now appearing again before you, I would wish it to be distinctly understood that I propose, in any part I may have to take in connexion with you in our renewed efforts, that you should decide we are to renew them, for maintaining the ground we have already achieved upon this question, to pursue precisely the same course. We have no object in view in appearing here to serve any party of politicians. I do not come here with the view of taking any steps which would be likely to displace one body of men as politicians, and to place in their situations men of another comp exion of politics. I disavow any such intention whatever. I appear here merely to advocate a cause which I believe experience has shown to be worthy of a single effort; and, if it please you that we shall renew our labours, we propose that it shall be under the same rules and regulations which led us triumphantly to victory on the last occasion, and we shall strictly confine ourselves to the object for which we have now met together. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) I have said we have experience has shown that the cause in which we are engaged is worthy of the efforts we bestowed upon it. I most solemnly declare, myself, that, in the most exaggerated flights of my fancy, I never expected so great a result from the labours of the Anti-Corn-law League as has been witnessed within the last four years. (Cheers.) Take, for instance, the single fact which comprises almost our whole case. Since the day we laid down our arms there has been imported into this country in grain and flour of all kinds an amount of human subsistence equal to upwards of 50,000,000 qrs. of grain—(Hear, hear)—a larger quantity than had been imported from foreign countries during the 25 years preceding 1846, namely, from the year 1821 down to the time at which we brought our labours to a close. (Hear, hear.) And now, gentlemen, in that one fact is comprised our case. You have had, at the very lowest computation, 5,000,000 of your countrymen, or contemporaries, or country children subsisting upon the corn that has been brought from foreign countries; and what does that fact say for the comfort you have brought to the homesteads of those families? (Hear, hear.) What does it say of the peace and prosperity and serenity of domestic life in those homes into which 5,000,000 quarters of grain have been introduced, and whose occupants, but for your exertions, must either have been left in penury, or must have subsisted on potatoes? But I need not go into statistics to show what the beneficial consequences of your action have been. You may see your triumph in a nation's eyes; you may read it in the countenances of the people of all classes; you may trace it in their improved clothing and habits. You may see the triumph of your cause in the decrease of pauperism, and in the diminution of crime, standing over the whole country. You may see it in every aspect in which you can set it by means of the pulse of society—the consuming of the great mass of the people. (Hear.) Well, if we have done so much, what have we averted? (Hear.) How much of suffering and of privation must the great mass of the people not have endured had it not been for your triumph? How much of vice and crime, and consequent misery, must have pervaded the great mass of the country if they had been kept on that state of destitution and privation which must have existed, but for the introduction on the great amount of human subsistence? These, then, are our reasons for renewing our efforts to maintain the ground we have achieved; and I think they form a sufficient justification for our coming forward, on this occasion, to the one question we have in hand, as we did before. (Hear.) It cannot be concealed that there are many gentlemen who press the body of men who are assembled on the present occasion to enter upon other questions as well as upon the question of the Corn-laws. They say, "Why don't you go for a large measure of Parliamentary reform, which would not only enable you to carry Free-trade in corn, but a great many other measures?" Now, in the first place that the fallacy that lies under this argument or entreaty is this. It is assumed, because we are going to make an effort to put an end for ever to this question of Free-trade, that therefore we have a right to prevent other people from entering upon the consideration of other questions. Now, we do not say that because gentlemen join in the movement of the Anti-Corn law League again, they are to abandon other principles or neg ect other movements; but what we do say is this, that, having shown you the vast social benefits that have arisen from the establishment of the principle of Free Trade in food, and the advantages that have resulted to the great mass of the people from that measure, we do not feel justified while we are morally certain that in a few months we can put this question for ever out of the category of controversial questions —in placing ourselves backwards, by taking up other questions upon which the public is not so well informed or so completely united—we, the men who have had the responsible duty of taking an active part in the agitation before, do not think it justifiable that we should change our position in the House of Commons from that of a majority to a minority, and so retard the definite settlement of this question from a period of three or four months to probably as many years. (Hear, hear.) With regard to the course recommended in the resolution which have been read by your chairman, it is proposed that you should re-organise the Anti-Corn-law League, and that you should send out circulars to all your old friends and colleagues throughout the country, calling upon them to rouse themselves into action in order to prevent the repeal of free trade in corn. It is proposed further, that you should memorialise the Queen, and that you should call upon your friends in all parts of the country to memorialise her Majesty, that Parliament may be dissolved—(Hear, hear)—in order that an opportunity may be afford to the country of giving a new judgment on this question. (Cheers.) According to the terms of the resolution, you are to memorialise the Queen to dissolve Parliament at once—immediately; in order to avoid the carrying of those who might think we were not duly awake to the importance of transacting the public business of the country, I may as well say that an immediate dissolution of Parliament is not possible. There are certain things which, if your Parliament meets a fortnight hence, must be done. We must vote a certain amount of supplies on account, to enable the Government to go on during the process of a general election. There is one act, the Mutiny Act, which must be passed before the beginning of April, in order to prevent the disbanding of the army. Certain things must be done before Parliament can dissolve; but what we wish the country to understand is, that we advocate the immediate dissolution of Parliament after these necessary public forms are gone through, in order that we may no longer be kept in suspense upon this vital question—(Hear, hear)—and that all the great interests of the country may not remain in a state of anxiety and apprehension as to the possible issue of this contest. Now, it will very likely be asked, "Why should you dissolve Parliament, and seek an immediate decision upon this question?" and many of our friends will, probably think at first that it is rather rash, when we are beginning our organisation, to seek at once to bring our opponents to mortal combat. It is possible, however, that those who are members of Parliament, and who may have better opportunities of judging as to the reasons which should determine our policy, than persons who are not within the arcana of political legislation. (Hear, hear.) I have the strongest belief that we are safe from everything but delay, and the tricks of politicians which will be practised during that delay. (Great cheering.) I want to bring this question to a definite issue, which will be a thing most unlike any other question. (Hear, hear.) We not only have friends who wish us to blend other questions with this, which we think might most materially damage our cause, and probably altogether sacrifice it, but our enemies will play the same game if they can in their only chance. Leave this question in suspense during a whole session of Parliament, and what will be the result? In the first place, we all know from experience that it is not very easy to keep popular enthusiasm for a long period at the state to which you can probably bring it in the course of a few weeks. (Hear, hear.) You cannot keep the same enthusiasm alive for a number of months; but while it is being got together there are the arts of deception and misrepresentation, and one of their arts will be to try and mix other questions with this, and, if possible, to thrust some other question before it. (Hear.) Already I see the enemy loading a gun, trying to raise up again and again the banner of religious intolerance in the country. ("Hear, hear," and a laugh.) You may have Protestantism and Popery thrust before the question of the bread-tax. It is the old thing over again. Your enemies will try to be religious—(A laugh) they will pretend to be the only religious part of the country. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) They who tax the people's bread will profess to be the great champions of religion. You know that in old times they who "devoured widows' houses for a pretence made long prayers." (Laughter and cheers.) Now, from what I have seen of the men who fought and won the battle of free trade in corn, they were practically and essentially the most pious men I have met with in the course of my career in life. (Hear, hear.) And still have accusations of infidelity, and Popery, and all sorts of charges made against those very men, if by that means their opponents can change the issue from the question of free trade in corn to some other. Why, I have no doubt they will come to raise the issue of the Monarchy. (A laugh.) I have seen it already put forth that the Monarchy is in danger if we are allowed to organise and succeed in our object. (Renewed laughter.) You in Manchester have had a Queen's visit not many months ago, by a demonstration which only Lancashire and Manchester men can make—which astonished Royalty, and those attendant on Royalty, who had witnessed the great pageants of Europe in former years—your loyalty and devotion to the institutions of the country; ay, you will be charged by those bread-takers as being enemies of the Monarchy and promoters of revolution! (Laughter and cheers.) You need not be surprised at any charge that may be brought against you with a view to divert attention from the real question, if you will only give your enemies time. Now, I say, give them no time. ("Hear, hear," and loud cheers.) Let this question of the Corn-laws occupy the front rank, and let it be the only question for those who think that it can be settled by one effort, and in the course of the next three months. Let this question take precedence of all others that can possibly be brought to battle or confuse you, and then we shall succeed in the same manner as you did before. (Cheers.) But I am told that we must allow the Protectionists to remain in office for a twelvemonth, because it will give them the opportunity of abandoning all their professions and principles—(Laughter)—and of cheating their friends! (Continued laughter.) Now, gentlemen, I am afraid that they would cheat us. (Renewed laughter.) But what morality is this? Surely it is something new in England! Are we to be told that a body of men who have staked into power simply and solely by their professions of Protectionist principles, if you will only do them reputation in office for twelve months, and draw their salaries of from £5000 to £1200 a year, will abandon every one of their professions, scatter their principles to the winds, and allow their dupes, the Protectionists, to go whistle for Protection? (Laughter.) Now, that, I say, is something new in the morals of politics in this country. We have had that such things may be done, but it is the first time I have ever heard such a policy as that openly advocated and recommended to a Government. I tell you candidly, I do not believe that Lord Derby and his colleagues are half the fools the Free-traders take them to be. What! will the men who hunted that illustrious statesman, Peel, to his grave for having abolished the Corn-laws—the men whose sole political capital from that time to this has been the accusation of political obloquy with which they have covered his name and fame, and the abuse and denunciation with which they have loaded "the gentlemen of the Manchester school"—(Laughter and cheers)—will these men, do you say, that Sir R. Peel did, but ten times worse? Sir Robert Peel, when he found it necessary, and when he in his conscience believed it advisable that the Corn-laws should be abolished, resigned office, and remained out of office for eighteen days. Are we to say that I am not the man to carry the abolition of the Corn-laws; they may be abolished, but I am not the man to carry such a measure;" and he allowed his opponents, the Whigs, to come into office to accomplish that measure. It was only when they declared themselves in a state of effacing such a purpose, that Sir Robert Peel came back to power, carrying his colleagues with him to do that which he and himself declared he was the last man in the world to do. But Sir Robert Peel did not carry all his colleagues back with him. He left one—that was Lord George Bentinck (Derby (Laughter); and are we to believe that Lord Derby and his colleagues are to be considered as solely that they may immediate y get rid of the principles he has been advocating, and for abandoning which he denounced his former colleagues? I say, I do not believe it. To believe such a thing would be to assume that we were in a lower status of political morality than has been descended to even in France. What was it that has so strongly operated against the statesmen of France? To what was attributed the downfall of their political system? It was to the fact that public men made professions of political principles when out of office which they were one and all ready to abandon when they got into power, for the sake of place and patronage; and, consequently, the people ceased to have any confidence in public men. The same fate will overtake the men who pursue the same course in this country. In the same fate will follow newspapers here that followed newspapers in France. There is no confidence in the public press if that species of morality is allowed to be preached and practised in this country. (Hear, hear.) I do not believe the Ministry to be sincere in their professions; I believe they came into office with the view of carrying out those professions. But are you going to allow them to remain in office and to be sharpening their swords, in order that they may stab you when they find you off your guard? If not, the course we have to take is clear. We must raise this question both in the House of Commons and in the country, and we must not be recreant until it is disposed of. You know that Mr. Villiers, our old and trusty representative in the House of Commons (Cheers) has given notice of a motion that will test the opinion of that House on this subject. (Loud cheers.) Now, as it has been said that Mr. Villiers is the brother of Lord Carendon, and that he may not be able to bring his motion forward the question, I may as well state, once for all, that it was at our instance and at the interest of those with whom you are associated—that Mr. Villiers gave his notice of motion. (Hear, hear.) I can state from my own knowledge that he at once foresaw what would be said as to his wishing to reinstate the falling Ministry. He even said to me, "You might bring forward this motion probably with more propriety yourself." My answer was, that it was due to him, who had so nobly maintained our principles in the House of Commons, that nobody else should be allowed to intervene upon that question while he remained in that House. (Cheers.) I will go further in explanation of the fact that it was suggested to Mr. Villiers, and the terms of the motion were given to him in such a way that it should go to the extent of declaring that the House of Commons would have no confidence in any Government that did not maintain intact the whole principle of free trade in corn. Mr. Villiers himself proposed to give it even the semblance of a party attack upon the existing Government. (Loud cheers.) But, if there be any difficulty in bringing the question to an issue by the terms of the motion of which Mr. Villiers has given notice, I do hope and trust—and I am sure he will be the first to yield to my wishes upon this subject—that if it be necessary to bring forward a motion of want of confidence in the Ministry, we shall do so rather than allow this question time to dissolve Parliament. ("Hear, hear," and a laugh.) Now, I tell you candidly—and it is a secret, coming from a member of Parliament that I never yet knew the power time in the eyes of members of Parliament for a dissolution. (Laughter.)

After dwelling at some length on the propriety of appealing to the country by a dissolution at as early a period as possible, which step he regarded as the most certain means of putting the Protectionists, as a Parliamentary party, out of existence, the hon. gentleman proceeded to say:—

You will then have all parties moving on fresh ground. None will be able to claim merit as Free-traders when all are Free-traders; and those politicians who now pride themselves upon their support of the Free-trade question will have to shake it out a reef, and throw out their sails to catch the gale in some other direction. I have confidence enough in the patriotism of the Protectionists to believe that they will find something else to engage their attention, quite as much to our interest as to their own. Get rid of this difficulty, and you will find the objection that we are going to render government impossible. We have a plain and straightforward course to pursue. We won our battle before by pursuing a straightforward course, regardless of the interests of all political parties. I am surprised that, taking that course upon a great question which involved the interests the whole community, the effect should have been the breaking up of parties and of Governments. I have always said, and said seven years ago, that we should destroy two or three Governments before this question was settled, and now I say, without caring for consequences, not dreading consequences—feeling certain that the consequences will be useful to the country, let all classes unite, the humblest as well as the richest, and let us put the Government out of three courses. Either they must recant fully and completely their principles of Protection; or they must resign their seats in the Government; or they should dissolve Parliament. One of those three courses we will compel them to take—(Loud and continued cheering)—and when you have accomplished either of those objects you will have effected all that I have in view. Do not doubt but that the Government of the country will be carried on. I do not see any necessity that we should despair of finding other men, as good as the present Ministry in every other respect, even if they are not as good Protectionists. ("Hear," and laughter.) But do every man, woman, and child join together in forcing the Government to one of the courses I have mentioned. Do not let us be alarmed by any bugbears, or thrown upon any false scents; and if we pursue a straightforward course, in less than three or four months you will be relieved from all the labour in which we have now engaged. (Loud cheering.)

Mr. Robert Ashton, of Hyde, seconded the resolution, which was immediately carried,

Mr. Thomas Bazley, M.P., moved, and Mr. Heywood, M.P., seconded, the next resolution; viz.

That the council of the League be requested to put themselves into immediate communication with their friends in all parts of the kingdom, urging them to immediate action to prevent the return to Parliament of candidates in favour of the Protectionist cause, under whatever pretence or form, of any duty upon the importation of foreign corn.

Agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. Bright, M.P., the following resolution and memorial to the Queen were carried amidst enthusiastic applause:

That this meeting, considering how essential it is to the welfare of the agricultural, manufacturing, colonial, and shipping interests, as well as to the peace and prosperity of the great body of the people, that the free trade question should be permanently settled by an appeal to the country: Resolved that a memorial to the Queen, praying for an immediate dissolution of Parliament, be signed by the chairman on behalf of this meeting, and transmitted for presentation to her Majesty.

"TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

"May it please your Majesty,—We, your Majesty's loyal and devoted subjects, conscious of the earnest solicitude which your Majesty feels for the welfare and happiness of your people, and impressed with a deep sense of the danger which now threatens the security of those great measures of commercial policy which during the last four years, have conduced so greatly to the prosperity and social contentment of all classes of your Majesty's subjects, have seen with distrust and alarm the accession to power of a Government pledged by all the obligat ons of personal honour and public duty to attempt the restoration of odious restrictions on the trade and industry of this country.

"That your memorialists, while recording their solemn and emphatic protest against any and every attempt to reimpose, in whatever shape, taxes on the food of the people, are firmly persuaded that an overwhelming majority of the British people are of the same opinion; that any renewed proposals to resist and defeat such a policy as an unjust and dangerous aggression on the rights and liberty, the freedom of trade and commerce, and the social welfare and domestic happiness of the great mass of your Majesty's subjects.

"That your memorialists believe that doubt and uncertainty on this subject are calculated to disturb and jeopardise all trading and industrial operations, to keep alive a spirit of agitation and resistance throughout your Majesty's dominions; to foment false hopes, and foster injurious apprehensions; and that every sound reasons of state policy demand an immediate and decisive settlement of a question fraught with such manifest elements of dissnion and disquietude to all the great interests of the nation.

"Your memorialists, therefore, would loyally and respectfully beseech your Majesty not to suffer the interests of your subjects to be postponed to the exigences of a temporising Administration, or any party difficulties that may conflict with sound maxims of constitutional policy; but that your Majesty, in the just exercise of your loyal prerogative, will cause the great issue now pending between the responsible advisers of the Crown and the people at large to be forthwith and finally determined by a speedy dissolution of Parliament.

"And your memorialists will ever pray."

On the motion of Mr. Ashworth (of Turton), seconded by Mr. Kershaw, M.P., it was also resolved—

That, in order to carry out the above resolutions, a subscription be forthwith commenced, and that a call of 10 per cent. upon all subscriptions of £5 and upwards be made; subscriptions under that amount to be paid in full.

The Chairman announced at the close of the meeting that a committee would sit daily during the week to receive subscriptions.

DIGNITY VINDICATED AFTER THE MANNER OF THE UNITED STATES CONGRESS

In the House of Representatives at Washington, on the 11th ult., the following amusing but disgraceful scene occurred between two of the members—Messrs. Stanly and Giddings. The former having charged the latter with uttering a falsehood, the following conversation ensued:

"Mr. Stanly: It is usual for one who has no regard for the decencies of life to relieve himself from responsibility by pronouncing statements false, and it is characteristic of the man who sneaked away from this House, and took his pay for work which he did not do.

"Mr. Giddings: When the gentleman descends to low vulgarity, I cannot follow him. I protest against Doughfaces prompting the gentleman from South Carolina.

"Mr. Stanly: It is the business of a scavenger to have anything to do with him, and I will have to wash my hands after handling him; but the thing is to be done, as he has thrust himself on us as a kind of censor. It is a small business for me, and I don't like to descend any lower than to take hold of the hon. member for Ohio. (Cry of 'Good.')

"Mr. Giddings: Will you hear me.'

"Mr. Stanly: Nobody wants to hear you, but I will indulge you.

"Mr. Giddings: The gentleman is barking up the wrong tree.

"Mr. Stanly: The galled jade winces again.

"Mr. Giddings: The gentleman shan't crack the overseer's lash to put me down.

"Mr. Stanly: I hope that the gentleman will not quash his teeth so hard; let my words pass by. Who is here playing the overseer over white men—by whom, but who is throwing his filthy gab over the shoulders of the northern Whig Doughfaces, and what he calls the vile slaveholders? He is a fit one to censure me in that way. We don't raise the overseers lash over our slaves in North Carolina. If that member, from his district, having slunk into my county, nobody would own him as a black man with a white skin—(Laughter)—but he would be set down as what he is, a free negro, and in the course of three weeks he would be brought up to the whipping-post and hacked, for uttering or slandering his neighbours. (Laughter.) If I say that he is a gentleman, I tell a falsehood.

"The Speaker (to Mr. Stanly): Will the gentleman suspend for a moment?

"Mr. Stanly: We ought to suspend that fellow (pointing to Mr. Giddings) by the neck. (Laughter.)

"Mr. Giddings: The gentleman from North Carolina reminds me of the boy who turned round so fast that the tail part of his breeches was on both sides. (Laughter.) The gentleman says that I was at Norktown, but where was he and the members of the House? Why, drinking their grog. (Laughter.) "Mr. Stanly: I charge the editors and reporters not to let his (Mr. Giddings's) fetor-ous hand touch one word of what I say, for we know how the fragrant occasion misrepresented my colleague from the Orange district, and his own conscience from the Cuyahoga district, having slunked his own speech after he got to his room with his coloured friends. (Laughter.) He talks about his associates; but has anybody ever seen him in private decent company? Free negroes may call to see him. He does not let his right hand know what his left doeth. He alludes to my absence; but I have not absented myself as a slanderer. I don't say I'm always in the house, as I ought to be. He says we were here drinking and eating oysters at Norktown. Where was he? In Philadelphia, drinking beer and eating oysters with free negroes. (Laughter.) Which was the best off? Judge ye. (Laughter.) He thinks he was better off than we were. Mr. Speaker, this

PROCESSION OF QUEEN ISABELLA TO THE CHURCH OF ATOCHA, MADRID.

THE PROCESSION OF THE QUEEN OF SPAIN TO THE CHURCH OF ATOCHA.

In our Journal of last week we fully described the grand ceremony of the Procession of Queen Isabella to the Church of Atocha, to return thanks for the double blessing of her escape from assassination, and the recent happy birth of a Princess. We now engrave a portion of the pageant, and refer our readers to page 170 for the leading features.

The cortege passed through the Calle Mayor, the Calle de Alcala, and along the Prado, the great length of which route compels our Artist to represent but a portion of the procession. The marked peculiarities of the scene consist in the vista of balconies hung with richly embiazoned carpets and sumptuous curtains. The gentlemen of the Court, Peers, &c., walked, carrying their hats under their arms; in fact, except the soldiers, all were bare-headed, and even the ladies dropped the mantilla. From the balconies several doves were flown.

Of our Illustrations, the lower one represents the young girls carrying garlands of flowers, with music, &c., heading the procession.

The larger Illustration shows the Royal carriage, in which are seated the Queen and the Princess Royal, accompanied by the King and the nurse of the infant. Queen Maria Christina did not join the Royal procession to Atocha, because her Majesty, since she fractured her leg at Aranjuez last summer, cannot get into the State carriages on account of their height. She was, accordingly, obliged to drive directly to the church, where she awaited her daughter's arrival.

On the 16th ult. the Queen admitted to a private audience Lord Howden and General Aupick, who presented to her Majesty autograph letters from Queen Victoria and the Prince President of the French Republic, expressive of the deep affliction they had felt at the horrible attempt made on her august person. Queen Isabella read these letters with evident marks of emotion and pleasure, and manifested to the representatives of the two Powers her heartfelt gratitude for the sentiments awakened in the minds of her august allies by that deplorable event.

On the 21st the capital resumed its wonted aspect, the hangings and decorations of the houses having been everywhere removed. The Queen presided on that day at a bull-fight; and the Princess Royal took an airing, accompanied by her nurse and her Lady of Honour, the Marchioness of Povar.

A Royal decree has been published, stating that her Majesty, anxious to prove, by a public and solemn pledge, how much she cherished the memory of the Captain of Artillery, Pedro Velarde Santyan, who died on the 2d of May, 1808, heroically defending the throne and the independence of the magnanimous Spanish nation on that glorious day, had conferred a title of Castille, to be enjoyed by him and his heirs for ever, on his brother, Don Julian Velarde Santyan, who shall hereafter assume the title of Count Velarde, Viscount of the Second of May.

The Epoca announces that the Duke and Duchess of Montpensier would leave in the beginning of March for Valencia, where they are to embark in a Royal steamer to Italy. They will thence proceed to England, on a visit to Queen Marie Amelie, and return to Andalusia in the beginning of summer.

The Carnival was extremely gay. Numerous masks traversed the streets.

On the night of 22d Queen Christina gave a grand ball: Queen Isabella danced nearly every set, and retired at half-past five A.M.

CHILDREN DANCING BEFORE THE COMPAGE.

MISS HELEN FAUCIT, AS JULIA, IN "THE HUNCHBACK," ACT. II., SCENE I., AT DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.—MISS FAUCIT'S "JULIA."

OUR Artist has given a scene from "The Hunchback," in commemoration of the recent performances at Drury-lane of Miss Faucit in the character of the heroine. This lady's reading of the character is a serious one. Well taught by Master Walter in all that can cultivate the female mind, she is from the first a precocious woman; and, accordingly, all the learned dialogue with which the part is burthened, is accounted for on the theory of especial training. The dissipations of a London life, however, go far towards effacing early impressions; and would doubtless succeed, but that her early instructor comes to the rescue, and contrives a plot which, in its issue, makes her perceive and fully understand her fault. Such a practical lesson, wringing so the heart, and bringing out the finest emotions in the trials of love, was never provided before either in real life or on the stage. Mr. Knowles's imagination alone bodied it forth; and so true is it as a work of genius to what the process of nature in the female bosom would be under the given circumstances, that we may venture to predict immortality for this exquisite stage poem. In its more solemn aspects, as we have said, Miss Faucit has realised the character, and acts it throughout with that delicacy and softness of feeling and intonation which constitute the peculiar charm of her style. The Illustration which we have given is from the second act, in which the change that has come over Julia's character is shown in its temporary fatal effects. This situation Miss Faucit realises with infinite spirit. We see in it the strong-minded, self-determined woman driven for the moment by her impulses into a wrong direction. The after change into the opposite is made with equal power and tact. We regret that Miss Faucit's engagement has not permitted a longer run to her favourite parts.

ARCHITECTURAL EXHIBITION, PORTLAND GALLERY.

THE Architectural Exhibition, by the number and variety of the contributions to it, gives proof of a growing taste on the part of the public for ornamental building, at least, if not for the higher walks of architecture considered as a fine art. Though we may regret that the advance made is not always in the very best direction, it is gratifying to find even a desire and an intention to improve the aspect of our domestic buildings, both for the credit of those who occupy the insides, and for the contentment of those who are only permitted to survey the exterior. Hitherto, it is true, much of this has been aimed at by means of ornamentation stuck on to buildings naturally unsightly; but in course of time it will be found how much more of the beauty of architecture depends upon the proportions of the building itself than the materials of which it is composed, or the adjuncts which may be put upon it. Thus are ample materials for a good day's study of the true and the false principle to be found in the 360 designs exhibited. Amongst the projects of more general interest we remarked a very creditable design for remodelling the façade of the present National Gallery, without disturbing the line of the present front, by H. B. Garling; and designs for the improvement of the banks of the Thames, between Blackfriars and Westminster Bridges, by T. Allom, which are in the main an extension of the principles exemplified in the Adelphi-terrace. E. Sharpe exhibits a series of designs illustrating the seven periods of English architecture—Saxon, Norman, transitional, lancet, geometrical, curvilinear, and rectilinear; the last six from portions of our principal cathedrals. Amongst the provincial architects we notice, as entitled to great praise, some designs of buildings erected by E. Walters, of Manchester, two being of private residences, and two of warehouses at Manchester, the latter being very handsome structures of Italian architecture, quite as stately as our best London club-houses, though not, of course, so highly ornamented. Aitchison's design for the new Palatine Club-house at Liverpool is in every way creditable, displaying the essentials of breadth and purity of style. In the collection of materials, patents, &c., we remarked several well-known objects which figured and obtained prizes at the Great Exhibition.

Among the models is an exquisite one exhibited by Mr. Cundy, showing the restoration of the tomb of Queen Philippa, in Westminster Abbey, by Mr. G. G. Scott, architect. This most splendid monument was executed in the year 1370, by one Hawkin Liege, from France, at a cost of £133 6s. 8d.; or, when reduced to our present currency, about £2000. The character of the work throughout shows the hand of a foreign artist. The richness of the whole must have been truly wonderful. The niches were occupied by thirty-two statuettes, representing different branches of the family, and of which a nearly accurate list is preserved: those shown in the portion exhibited, which represents the head of the altar tomb, are the figures of Edward the Black Prince, Lewis Emperor of Germany, King Edward III., John King of France, and William Earl of Hainault. Besides the effigy of the Queen and the statuettes above named, there was a vast number of angels in the tabernacle-work and elsewhere; so that the whole monument contained not less than eighty figures, which, from the remains that have been found, must have been most delicate works of art. The monument is now in a state of deplorable dilapidation, and one of the objects of the present work is to excite a feeling for its restoration, which we hope to see carried into effect.

Professor Donaldson, on Monday week, read to the Royal Institute of British Architects a very interesting paper on the national question of preserving the great historical monuments in Westminster Abbey, wherein he glances at the sumptuous work before us, observing:—"The appeals that have been made to the public to raise funds for its restoration, and the exquisite specimen of the work which was one of the attractions of the Great Exhibition, will have made you familiar with the value of this monument as a work of art." It is of alabaster, and, like the other monuments of this material in the Abbey, it has better resisted the corroding effects of the damp atmosphere than the Petworth marble, the deterioration of the alabaster memorials arising entirely from wanton mischief.

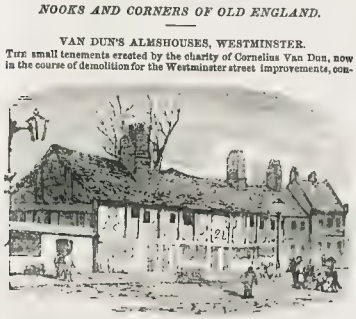
PROPOSED RESTORATION OF THE TOMB OF QUEEN PHILIPPA, IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

On Saturday last a number of Polish exiles invited Lieut. Szulczewski to a dinner at the Freemasons' Tavern, and presented him with a handsome ring, in testimony of the high estimation in which his character is held, and of the valuable services rendered by him to the cause of Poland, in connexion with the honourable office which he occupied as Secretary of the Literary Association of the Friends of Poland. The ring, which is a beautiful specimen of workmanship, and was made by a Pole, has on it engraved the family arms of Lieut. Szulczewski, with a suitable inscription in the Polish language.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

VAN DUN'S ALMSHOUSES, WESTMINSTER.

THE small tenements erected by the charity of Cornelius Van Dun, now in the course of demolition for the Westminster street improvements, contained, originally, twenty rooms, to be inhabited rent free by as many poor women. They were founded in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, under whom Van Dun officiated as Yeoman of the Guard, a post which he likewise held in the preceding reigns of Mary, Edward VI., and Henry VIII. He was a native of Brabant. His monument in St. Margaret's, Westminster, contains a good bust and the following inscription:—



VAN DUN'S ALMSHOUSES, PETTY FRANCE, WESTMINSTER.

Cornelius Van Dun lieth here, borne at Breda, in Brabant, soldier with King Henry at Turney, Yeoman of the Guard, and Vsher to King Henry, King Edward, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth: of honest and vertuous life, a carefull man for poore folke, who in the end of this towne did build for poore widowes twenty houses at his own cost.

Round the figure is inscribed:—

Obijt anno Dom. 1577, buried the 4 of September, ætatis sue 94.

The tenements founded by Van Dun were of the smallest and plainest description. Not being endowed, they were appropriated to the parish pensioners of St. Margaret's, Westminster. The site of these humble edifices was formerly called St. Hermit's-hill, probably from a cell or hermitage there situate. A chapel dedicated to St. Mary Magdalen is mentioned by Stow as standing near, "wholly ruinated."

THE LATE SIR ROBERT PEEL'S STATUE.—This masterpiece of art, by Behnes, is cast in one solid piece in bronze, and the difficult and interesting operation of pouring the metal into the mould was performed within the last few days at Mr. Frederick Robinson's foundry, Pimlico, with the utmost success. The result proves that England is capable of equalling foreigners in casting works of art of the largest dimensions. Its intended site is opposite the Court-House at Leeds. The size is colossal. The bronze statue for the city of London, by the same eminent sculptor, is also in a state of great forwardness.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1852.

WE learn by the last Overland Mail from India, that the nation has another war upon its hands besides that which is raging at the Cape, and with an enemy somewhat more formidable than Sandili. But the war, though new, is with an old opponent, and arising out of circumstances not entirely unconnected with former hostilities. In the year 1826 the war with the Burman Empire was brought to a successful issue, after about two years' hard fighting; the then Sovereign of Burmah agreeing to pay an indemnity of one million sterling towards the expenses of the struggle into which he had forced us, and to relinquish all claims upon Arracan and the districts lying to the south of the Salween river. But the indemnity was irregularly paid; the Burmese Emperor, who at first refused to receive a British representative at all, dismissed him from his capital in 1839, and forced him to take up his residence in Rangoon, from which place he was finally obliged to withdraw in 1840. Since that time the intercourse between the British power and the Burmese has been in the highest degree unsatisfactory; and although the Emperor ultimately found it politic to pay the indemnity of a million, he instituted a system of oppression against English trade and English interests at Rangoon which has for the last eight or ten years produced constant ill-feeling. The Burmese, finding that English complaints were not followed by English guns, proceeded from bad to worse in their treatment of the merchants of Rangoon, until the Governor-General has at length found it necessary to bring them to their senses by the ultima ratio of all states, civilised or uncivilised. Lord Dalhousie, finding all other kinds of remonstrance unavailing, despatched a vessel of war and two armed steamers to demand from the Burmese Governor of that port an explanation and an indemnity for the confiscations and other oppressions of which the British merchants had complained. It appears that the Governor demanded time to report to his Sovereign at Ava, and that an interval of thirty-five days was allowed him for that purpose. But, for some reason not explained, and of which the next Overland Mail will probably bring all the needful intelligence, hostilities were commenced by the British before the expiration of the term specified. Several forts were captured or destroyed at the mouth of the Irawaddy river, and upwards of three hundred of the Burmese were slain. This is all that appears to be known in England upon the subject of the war; but the country is sufficiently well informed of the disinclination of the British Government to extend its territory in India, and of the proverbial perfidy, or, at least, unreliability, of the jealous and vindictive Oriental potentates by whom we are surrounded on every frontier, to doubt that the war on our part is a necessary one.

Our wars in India have for a long time been strictly defensive; and if rash, arrogant, and weak powers will miscalculate our strength and resources, insult our people, destroy our trade, encroach upon our limits, or organise schemes for driving us out of India altogether, we must, perforce, disabuse them of their erroneous ideas at the proper time, and read them the necessary lesson that shall keep them quiet. We cannot afford to lose ground in India. The old motto of Scotland, "Nemo me impune lacessit," should be the motto of the British power in the East. Upon that understanding, and upon that only, can we hold our own against the swarm of Sikhs, Affghans, Burmese, Afreedies, and other warlike and semi-savage nations or tribes that look with fierce dislike upon our presence among them. If we brought a scourge to the country, and were the oppressors of the millions amongst whom we have cast our lot, our defence against attack might wear a different appearance; but, notwithstanding all the faults we have committed, we have been the benefactors of the Indian people, and they know it. The warlike and intractable nations who live by the organised plunder of war would gladly eject us; but if, in combating them, we are compelled to extend our territory, whether we wish it or not, there is no ground to accuse us of lust of territorial aggrandisement, or of an insatiable desire of dominion. It is to be hoped, however, if the Burmese are not contented with the small chastisement that they have already received, that the present war may neither last so long, nor cost so much, as the last. It would scarcely suit the purposes of the Burmese Government that we should annex Pegu and the delta of the Irawaddy; but this, in all probability, will be the ultimate result of the war, if that Sovereign do not form a more correct estimate both of his own strength and of ours.

THE shadow of a Parliament has just been elected in France. What sort of a Parliament it will be, is a secret that no man can pretend to discover. One noteworthy fact in connexion with it is that General Cavaignac has been elected in one of the districts of the capital, in opposition to the Government. The other members are, for the most part, if not entirely, men of no mark, substance, or character. All the wealth, statesmanship, and genius of the country have kept aloof from Louis Napoleon, in his insane and desperate onslaught upon the liberties of the French nation; and none but the neediest and most reckless of adventurers have shown any eagerness to identify themselves with him. They turn out, however, that many of the members of the new Legislative Assembly will show both intelligence and virtue, and that they will not consent to be the dumb puppets of the despotic system under which they have been nominated. Louis Napoleon has done his utmost to have an obedient and slavish Assembly. He nominated his prefects, and by himself and his prefects he nominated the future deputies. He prevented opposition by rendering it an offence punishable by military law for the electors to meet and deliberate upon the choice of a candidate; and he prevented any candidates not of his own nomination from having any address or other document by which they might inform the electors of their opinions; but, notwithstanding all these tyrannical precautions, it may so happen that there may have been infiltrated into the Assembly a score or two of Cavaignacs, or even of better men; and that the President will find more difficulty in managing this shadowy Council than he found in calling it together. It should, however, to what a desperate ebb the liberties and fortunes of the French people have been reduced, that even the composition of such a body as this can inspire a hope of a change for the better. The stocks and stones which the President has thrown between his huge legs, may prove, like those of Deucalion, not stones after all, but strong men, destined to possess the land when Deucalion shall be no more. It is a small chance, it must be admitted; and no doubt the French people, disabused at last, will clung to it until they find or make a better one.

VISIT OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT TO THE EVENING CLASSES, CANNEY HALL.—On Tuesday the committees of the evening classes held at Crosby Hall were honoured with a visit from his Royal Highness Prince Albert. So sudden and unexpected was His Royal Highness' visit, that the Lord Mayor was only apprised of the fact a quarter of an hour previously. His Royal Highness was received by the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, the Rev. Henry M'Kenzie, the Rev. Dr. Russell, the Rev. T. B. Murray, the Rev. Charles M'Naught, the Rev. —— Lusignan, &c.; and having minutely examined the system pursued by the committee, his Royal Highness was pleased to express his approbation of the same

Last year the importers of cotton lost large sums of money; this year they are clearing from a halfpenny to three-farthings a pound, or from 20s. to 30s. per bale. When you can pay three sums by a million or a million and a half, they become something considerable. This great interest never was in a more satisfactory state than it is at present.

Garbett, vicar of Harborne, from the clergy of Birmingham, including the rural dean, upon his retirement from the office of rural dean and rector of St. George's, Birmingham; the Rev. W. Harker, from the parishioners of St. Barnabas, South Kensington; the Rev J. O. Parr, vicar of Preston, from his friends; the Rev. R. Shephard, incumbent of St. Paul's, Newcastle, from the majority of his congregation; the Rev. R. J. Statham, rector of Tarporley, from the inhabitants of the parish and neighbourhood.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND READERS' ASSOCIATION.—On Sunday morning an eloquent sermon was preached at Christchurch, Blackfriars road, by the Rev. Rowley Morris, M.A., on the subject of the formation of the above association, which has been established about eight years, for the very laudable and Christian purpose of providing readers to impart a knowledge of the Scriptures to the poor and ignorant, in the courts, alleys, and other parts of the metropolis where assistance may be deemed most needful. They had 117 Scripture readers employed, but he regretted to learn that the funds were far from adequate to meet the expenses.—In fact, that the deficiency in the past year was not less than £2000. During that period the readers had constantly visited 118,000 families, comprising upwards of half a million persons; and, by urging the adults to go to church and to send their children to the above-named schools, or those of the parochial clergy. In giving liberally and cheerfully in such a society, they would not give in vain. The rev. gentleman concluded with a most eloquent appeal, and a liberal collection was subsequently received at the doors.

The Rev. Philip George Bartlett has been installed to the rectory of Ringwould, Kent, on the presentation of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Truro, his Lordship being the patron for this turn by reason of the lunacy of the present patron, Sir J. Bridges, Bart.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

The following appeared in our latest edition of last week :—

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY, FEB. 27.

Their Lordships met at five o'clock, Lord Redesdale (the Chairman of Committees) presiding.

This being the first sitting of their Lordships since the formation of the Earl of Derby's Ministry, the House presented a novel, and, in some respects, a very interesting aspect. The attendance of Peers was not large, perhaps, as might have been expected under the circumstances, but all the leaders of parties were present upon the occasion. Earl Derby, surrounded by his political friends, sat on the front Ministerial bench; the Marquis of Lansdowne, Earl Granville, and some of the other ex-ministers occupied the corresponding places on the other side of the House. A number of ladies filled the side galleries, and a large body of members from the Commons thronged the seats appropriated to their accommodation.

The Earl of DERBY rose amidst the marked attention of the House. Having passed a high eulogium upon the character and conduct of the Marquis of Lansdowne, as the late Ministerial leader of their Lordships' House, he referred to the necessity of having a well-disciplined and organised militia force in the country, upon which they could rely at all times against any foreign aggression. As regard to the foreign refugees, he said, that, while this country continued to afford them that hospitality for which it had ever been remarkable, he considered it to be the duty of the Government to keep a guard upon their actions, so as to prevent them doing anything to abuse that hospitality. With it re sorting to any system of espionage, the Government were bound to act upon the principle of comity of nations, and to see that no hostile measures against foreign powers were concocted in this country without taking immediate steps to apprise them of the fact. With respect to the proposed alteration in the imposition of foreign corn into this country, he considered that the recent policy of the Government in this respect was a departure from the policy introduced by the celebrated tariff of Sir R. Peel in 1842, to the principle of which he still adhered, and which principle he understood to be not merely to levy duties on articles of import for revenue, but also as a slight protection to competing articles of British produce. Such was the principle of the American tariff. "We, however," said the noble Lord, "appear to have proceeded recently upon a different principle; for while we admit with entire freedom many of those articles which enter into consumption, we load with an enormous amount of taxation a certain number of small articles of extensive consumption, which enter directly into the consumption, of the masses of the people. (Hear, hear.) When we look at the effect of this course, and on the supplies furnished to us from foreign countries, we find that the whole amount of these duties is paid ultimately upon the consumer in the shape of an increase of prices. (Hear, hear.) Between these two principles it appears to me that a course might be adopted which could not merely be defended upon principle, but I believe that it would be found the least burdensome in practice. At the same time I don't either shrink from expressing again as I have expressed on former occasions, that amongst these articles I see no reason why the sugar article of corn should be made an exception. (Hear, hear.) I state this as my opinion; but, at the same time, I have always said, that I think this is a question which can only be solved by a reference to the well understood wish and pressure of domestic and local taxation, must be by a Government strong in the confidence not only of Parliament, but of the country. I know that in the other House we are in an undoubted minority. I know not whether we shall be enabled to command a majority in favour of our views, even in the House which I have now the honour of addressing. But I say, my Lords, the motives which induced me to sacrifice at other considerations to avoid the responsibility of leaving the country without a Government, weighs on my mind with equal force to induce me to think that the public interests would not be consulted at this period of the year, and in the present circumstances of the world, by an unnecessary interruption for a considerable period of the sittings of the other House of Parliament. (Hear, hear.) My Lords, I am aware again that for the purpose of carrying out the policy which I consider to be advantageous to the interests of the country, that policy should be frankly and freely admitted; but, my Lords, while I make this admission, I must also confess, that in the abstract principle, that I would not have a much humbler, but at the same time a not less essential policy to enter on. (Hear, hear.) I avow, my Lords, that we cannot command a Parliamentary majority, and I avow, my Lords, that, in the face of this conviction, I have not declined the responsibility which has been thrown upon me." The noble Lord then proceeded to say that he knew that, in conducting the affairs of the country, her Majesty's Government will have, under such circumstances, to appeal to the forbearance of those who have opposed to them, and likewise to the kind indulgence of their friends. But they had confidence in the good sense and judgment of the House of Commons, that they would not unnecessarily introduce subjects of a controversial and party character for the mere purpose of interrupting the course of sound and useful legislation, and driving the Government out of that moderate and temperate course which should be prescribed to it. (Hear, hear.) He believed that if they avoided unnecessary party questions, and applied themselves to those great measures which the country had so long sought—measures of legal reform, of social reform—that, even as a minority in the House of Commons, they should not necessarily or dishonourably conduct the affairs of government. No man would be prepared to go further than her Majesty's present Government in checking the system of bribery at elections. It was not the intention of the present Government to proceed with the measure of Parliamentary reform introduced by the late Administration. If, however, the existence of particular grievances be proved, no men would be more ready than himself and his colleagues to apply the proper remedy to those grievances. He rejoiced in the belief that the feelings of the community and the convictions of all classes had come to the conclusion, that the greater the amount of education which they were able to give to the people the widely it was spread, the greater the chance of the tranquility and the well-being of the country. He spoke principal y of that education which includes the culture of the mind as well as the intellectual, and based upon a knowledge of the Scriptural and Evangelical truth. They would resist all encroachments on that Church and on that clergy, and would lend all the power of the Government to support and extend the influence of that Church and that holy calling. The noble Lord, in conclusion, said he could solemnly affirm that no motive of personal ambition had led him to aspire to the dangerous eminence of guiding the councils of his Sovereign. Trusting only in the assistance and help of a higher Power than his own, he ventured to undertake the important task that now devolved upon him. The noble Lord resumed his seat amidst prolonged cheers.

Earl GREY then rose and said that he had heard with regret, if not with consternation, of the intention of the Government to recur to a policy which had already been abandoned, by imposing a duty on the food of the people.

The Earl of DERBY rose for the purpose of explaining. What he had stated was, that he could see no reason why corn should form an exception to other articles imported from abroad on which it was customary to impose a duty for the sake of revenue. But he had also stated that that was a question which ought to be settled, and which, in fact, could only be settled, by the general voice of the community.

Earl GREY said, he felt somewhat relieved at hearing the explanation from the noble Earl. He should still, however, state that the noble Earl ought not, in his opinion, to keep back the intention of the Government on a question such as that, inasmuch as it was of vital consequence to the landed interest with reference to every transaction between a landlord and tenant, to the manufacturing and commercial interests, that the determination of the Government should be fully known. Otherwise, the whole commercial transactions of the country would be left in doubt and difficulty.

After a few words from Earl FITZWILLIAM and the Marquis of CLANRICARDE, their Lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

At four o'clock, when the Speaker took the chair, the House was very full, the Liberal members and the adherents of the late Ministry occupying the Opposition benches, whilst the Protectionist and Conservative Members sat on the Ministerial side.

Amongst the occupants of the Ministerial bench were, of course, absent, as by accepting office they vacated their seats, and required to be re-elected.

Sir J. Graham, Lord J. Russell, Lord Palmerston, Sir George Grey, Sir Charles Wood, &c, were among the occupants of the front Opposition bench.

NEW MEMBER.

Sir B. W. Brydges took the oaths and his seat for East Kent.

NEW WRITS FOR MINISTERIAL MEMBERS.

Mr. F MACKENZIE moved that new writs be issued for the election of members for the following places: Buckingham county, in the room of the Right Hon. B. Disraeli, who had accepted the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer; Midhurst, in the room of the Right Hon. Sir E. Walpole, Secretary of State for the Home Department; Droitwich, in the room of the Right Hon. Sir J. Pakington, her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies; Stamford, in the room of the Right Hon. J. C. Herries, Chief Secretary of the Board of Control; Oxford county, in the room of the Right Hon. J. W. Henley, President of the Board of Trade; Essex (Northern Division), in the place of Mr. Bernard, Secretary at War; Abingdon, in the place of Mr. Austen, Attorney-General; Colchester, in the place of Lord J. Manners, Chief Commissioner of the Woods and Forests; Portarlington, in the room of Colonel Dunne, Clerk to the Audience (daughter to the late Sir Frederick Flood); Kildare, in the place of Lord Naas, Chief Secretary for Ireland; Dublin University, in the room of Mr. J. Napier, Attorney-General for Ireland; Enniskillen, in the room of Mr. Whiteside, Solicitor-General for Ireland; Rathcormack, in the place of Mr. Bateson, Lord of the Treasury; Buckingham, (borough) in the stead of the Marquis of Chandos, Lord of the Treasury; Colchester, in the place of Lord C. H. Lennox, Lord of the Treasury; South Lincoln, in the room of Sir John Trollope, President of the Poor-law Board; North Lincoln, in the room of Mr. Christopher, who had accepted the office of Secretary of Her Majesty's Custom. Hunderds; Dorset, in the room of Mr Bankes, Judge Advocate General, Northern Division of Yorkshire, in the room of the Hon. A. Duncombe, Lord of the Admiralty; Tyrone County, in the room of Lord C. Hamilton, Treasurer of the Household; Wenlock, in the room of the Hon. G. C. Forester, Comptroller of the Household; and Cork, in the room of Mr. M. Power, who has been appointed Governor of St. Lucia.

HARWICH.

Mr. BARNICOT moved for a new writ for the borough of Harwich, which was void by the decision of a committee of the House. If, however, hon. gentlemen opposite were desirous of any inquiry on the matter, he would consent to postpone his motion for a fortnight.

Sir DE L. EVANS denounced the practices which prevailed during elections for Harwich, and moved as an amendment that the writ do issue this day six months.

Mr. B. OSBORNE opposed the issuing of the writ. Bribery had been so universal in Harwich-rough, that it had caused the constituency to double in number, whilst the inhabitants of the town had decreased. It was well known that his motion was made for the purpose of seating Sir F. Kelly, the new Solicitor-General. The conduct of the electors had been so scandalous, that the borough ought to be disfranchised.

Sir G. GREY said, it had been understood that the writ should not be moved without a proper notice to the House; and if it was determined to persist in the motion, he would suggest that the debate be adjourned for a fortnight, in order that the matter might be properly discussed.

After some further discussion the House was cleared for a division; but none took place, the motion and amendment being both withdrawn.

Several private bills were read a second time, including the London Necropolis and National Mausoleum Bill, after a division, in which there were 104 in favour and 92 against the bill: majority, 12.

MAYNOOTH.

Mr. SPOONER declared that his intention to bring on his motion for the repeal of the pecuniary grant to Maynooth was not altered by the fact of his friends coming into power; but that he was resolved to introduce it on an early day after Easter.

Mr. C. ANSTEY said, that if the House repealed the grant to Maynooth, he should move that all endowments to every church and religious body in the State should be also abolished.

THE CORN-LAWS.

Mr. C. VILLIERS gave notice for an early day of a motion, pledging the House to abide by the doctrines of Free Trade, and declaring its opposition to the re-imposition of a duty on the importation of corn.—Adjourned to Friday week.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

LAW APPOINTMENTS IN IRELAND.—The Right Hon. Thomas Lefroy has been appointed Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench in Ireland. The Right Hon. Richard Wilson Greene has been appointed a Baron of the Exchequer, in place of the Right Hon. Thomas Lefroy. Mr. John Wynne, of Haslewood (one of the members of the Devon commission) is appointed Under-Secretary for Ireland.

COUNTY COURTS FURTHER EXTENSION BILL.—Lord Brougham proposes to add a clause to this bill, to the effect that the Lord Chancellor shall appoint five judges, any three of whom (the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, or Common Pleas, or the Chief Baron being one) may frame a scale of fees for the county courts. This scale is to be submitted to Parliament, and not to be in force until six weeks after that time.

HEARTLESS FRAUD.—At the Liverpool Police Court, on Monday, a man named Laurence Nolan, formerly in the Dublin police, lately clerk to an emigrant ship-agent, and more recently carrying on business upon his own account in Regent-street, opposite the Clarence Dock, as "emigrant agent," was fully committed for trial at the next assizes, for having appropriated to his own use various articles of wearing apparel and other property belonging to an intending emigrant, named John Christian, a printer, who had paid for his passage from Liverpool to New York by the ship International. Christian has lost his passage by this fellow's fraud, and must remain until the assizes to prosecute.

The office of Queen's Advocate has been conferred upon John Dorney Harding, D.C.L., a member of the College of Advocates. He was admitted to the Bar in Doctors' Commons in Michaelmas Term, 1837. It is the first law appointment below the Bench, and takes precedence to the Attorney and Solicitor-General.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.

(THIRD NOTICE.)

NEWENHAM has a picture of some dimensions in the historical line (one of the few works of that class in the Exhibition)—No. 57, "The Princess Elizabeth (afterwards Queen) examined by certain of the council, Gardiner, Bonner, and others, touching her religious opinions, and particularly on the question of Transubstantiation." She is supposed to be replying in the lines—

> Christ was the word that spake it;
> He took the bread and brake it;
> And what he did he make it,
> That I believe and take it.

There is a good deal of ambition manifested in the study of the various heads, at least those of the males, who display great variety of expression, one having a keenly scrutinising, another a superlatively fine air, whilst a third is propounding a puzzling question; but the effort by which they have been produced is a little too apparent. The Princess—in whom, by the way, we fancy we discover an intended portrait of our present gracious Queen, and who should be the crowning light of the group—is rather tame in expression, whilst the colouring is harsh and chalky. No. 461, a "Spanish Dance," by the same artist, represents a very fine woman dancing with the castanets. The face is full of life and gaiety, and the attitude animated; but the treatment approaches in the slightest degree towards vulgarity.

And what shall we say of that beautiful face, lovely in her saddest sorrow (No. 63, "El Sueno," by H. W. Phillips), whose pale blue eye, fixed in thought, tells of the memories of the past, and of resignation which is to be the moral exercise for the future. It is evidently a portrait, and has been most carefully studied upon the original, even to the slight mole under the right eye, which, contrary to the conventionalisms of portraiture, has been faithfully recorded. But what we most remark in the treatment of this picture, after paying homage to the face and mind of the original, is the cruel coldness of atmosphere by which she has been unrelentingly surrounded. Cold as charity—cold as the thought which lives only upon the past—is every object within the sphere of her vision. The stone portals of a deserted hall; but have a chilly and forbidding aspect; colder still the cold grey dress; and colder still the sky without. The artist has adhered to the one sentiment of his subject with severity, and has produced a remarkable, if not altogether an agreeable picture.

Pass on for something more cheerful. Admire the character which pervades that little sketch of Giase's (No. 70), "The Far West—a Gallop after Buffalo." Those two cavaliers are regular Yankees, and no mistake, with formidable rifles slung by their sides, intent upon going ahead (their steeds, too, roughlooking customers), are evidently used to their work, and seem to like it.

H. Lejeune's "Lady and Child" (No. 118), which we engrave, is a little domestic group of every-day occurrence, but infused with so charming a spirit as to carry it far above the commonplaces of life. To idealise the beauty of the maternal character and to throw a halo of poetic sentiment over the very simple group presented in a mother nursing her child, has been the aim of the numberless painters of "Holy Families" since the earliest ages of Christianity. At this time the sacred character entirely predominated in these productions, and the "Virgin and Child" of the very early masters were objects of veneration rather than of love and sympathy. Raphael broke through this stern prescription, and humanised the divine group with marvellous mastery of conception, preserving its sublime individuality. Correggio went further in the introduction of mundane influences and attributes, but never lost sight of the poetry of the subject. The followers of these schools, after the gold is exhausted, and that there is not yet a mine of wealth for him who chooses to explore it, have painted "our picture—a mother and child? Although in our Protestant land "Holy Families" have gone out of fashion as matters of church decoration, and although the size of ordinary portrait groups are very grave and alarming, there are still features of beauty of the most elevated and inspiring character, and capable of endless variety of treatment in the physical constituents of such a subject. And Mr. Lejeune has very happily illustrated our position in the little work before us, which glows with a oneness of sentiment which, if not divine, speaks of the divinest part of humanity. In the mother's face, pride, happiness, affection, an exceeding hope are portrayed; in the same, whose attitude is natural and happy, there is but one thought, that of the parent, who to him is the only light and life in the world. If portraits, the artist has succeeded in completely idealising them. Both mother and child have golden hair, which at one side the artist has lit up with some of the sun's brightest beams. The colouring of this pleasing picture is delicate and transparent.

Adjoining the above we notice a quiet little study of an interior, by Miss E. Goodall (No. 114), "La Leçon Religieuse"—an aged female instructing a child in the Catechism and in the telling of beads. Highly creditable as to character and execution.

No. 145, "The Wages of War," by H. P. Gray, is a production after the classic school, which N. Poussin identified with himself, and which found many followers half a century ago. It is an allegory: on one side is a youthful warrior, armed, and impatient to go forth to the field of glory, heedless of the tears of a young wife, who clings hopelessly about his neck; on the other a widow drooping over a sarcophagus, where all her hopes of earthly happiness are entombed, whilst her child, an orphan, appeals by his look to the sympathy of the bystanders. In the midst is a wounded warrior in the agonies of death. The subject is an old-fashioned one, and the colouring tame; but there is so much merit in the conception of some of the figures (particularly the child, which brings reminiscences of some similar things of Raphael's), that it deserves honourable mention.

J. Sant exhibits two circular pieces, No. 162, "The Mother's Hope," and No. 503, "Music," of which the latter is the best. The head looking upward has something of inspiration in its character; the attitude is free and masterly in conception, and the execution, both of the face and of the hand which grasps the lyre, is careful and truthful. The colouring is massive, and effectively contrasted. At top, a blue sky, whose depth is heightened by the introduction of two or three stars of paley brightness; at bottom, a rich crimson drapery; whilst the central parts are occupied with flesh tints, and some pale green and other occasional colours of draperies. "The Mother's Hope" is an agreeable study, of a young parent enjoying with heartfelt pride the gambols of her first infant, who kicks up his heels in a manner at once natural and edifying. The expression is good, and the treatment clever; but the effect of the whole as a picture is somewhat marred by the colouring, which wants the depth of tone and massiveness which characterise the companion picture; and certainly, considering the extent of canvass occupied by the flesh tints, they are not well set off by the drabs and other undecided hues by which they are surrounded.

Marshall, whose "Shepherd's Daughter" we engraved in our last, has another very pleasing little picture (No. 471), "An Absorbing Story." A young girl sent to fetch water is sitting very comfortably by the side of the spring with a book in her hand, which entirely engrosses her attention. The face has an agreeable expression, and the whole of the work is very prettily treated.

Our friend G. Cruikshank presents us with an extraordinary piece of diablerie (No. 421), "Tam O'Shanter" gazing at the dance of warlocks and witches. The monsters of the poet's fancy, crowding and rioting in strange confusion, exhibit every possible variety of serio-comic feature and expression. A lurid glare pervades the scene, evidently borrowed from the red fire of the theatres.

Frost, who paints the human form with great carefulness, and, if not with the same power as Etty, with more of softness and delicacy, has two very beautiful subjects, miniature size — No. 373, "Galatea," and No. 389, "Wood Nymphs," styled "a sketch." The flesh in both, as to tint and texture, is executed with wonderful reality and brilliancy: and in the latter the grouping is clever, and the various colours of drapery, foliage, &c. judiciously selected and disposed.

A. Rowan, who, we believe, is a very young artist, exhibits a couple of little works which do him great credit, and hold out promise of far better things to come. No. 330 is a "Repose," the composition of which is good in style, evidencing study, and a respect for the dignity of the subject. The colouring, however, of the draperies is too heavy, too local, and might be subdued by a little more attention to the principles of chiaroscuro. No. 380, "Israel Blessing Joseph's Sons," is still more creditable in design than the preceding. Israel is supported on his couch in a sitting position by a black slave, on the right of the picture; whilst Joseph, on the other side, is attired in a rich white robe, embroidered in the Oriental style—an arrangement of some originality, and not displeasing. The grouping of the figures is simple, but effective. The finish, particularly in parts of minute detail, is wrought with great neatness and accuracy. This artist has commenced in a good, but much neglected school, and we would encourage him to stick to it, and to go on improving upon what has been already so creditably accomplished.

We described P. Goodall's little picture of the "Love-letter" in our last, and we this week have the pleasure of producing an Engraving of it. Without repeating our former observations, we will merely point to the general arrangements of the design: on the left is the lassie, who has just received a letter from some distant admirer; perhaps she has had too many admirers, or the suspected correspondent on the present occasion is not to her mother's taste, for she looks at her daughter askance and ill at ease from the opposite side of the picture. The post-boy and his pony, neither of whom concern themselves much about the love-letter, the writer, or its recipient, occupy the centre of the piece, in which they form an agreeable feature. The poultry and various etceteras of a farm-yard are introduced with a lavish and successful hand.

EXHIBITION OF THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.—"THE LOVE-LETTER."—PAINTED BY P. GOODAL

THOMAS MOORE.

After a long, a prosperous, and a brilliant literary and social career, Tom Moore—the poet of Love and Fancy—the most musical of song-writers—the most sparkling of political epigrammatists—the gayest and the happiest labourer in the most florid and fanciful of the realms of letters—has gone to rejoin the members of that departed galaxy of poetic talent in which he was one of the brightest lights, and of which he was, also, the longest survivor. Foremost, indeed, in the brilliant group of poets who ushered in the present century, and perfectly original and unapproachable in his own particular line, Moore's talents shone out vivid and lustrous, even in the luminous atmosphere in which they were exhibited. In certain departments of mental exertion, in vivacious and scintillating fancy, ever calling up in endless array new and sparkling imagery, and new and highly-coloured illustration—in elegance and tenderness of thought—frequently attaining, not to the deepest, but the gentlest and the most winning degree of pathos; and in the wonderful power which he possessed of musical diction, of handling our stern and rugged language, so as to make melody of the very words—in all these respects Moore has no rival near the throne. What Moore wants is just what prevents his being one of the very greatest poets: he has not serene and high-soaring imagination or severe and massive contemplation. He is the poet of the senses, rather than of the mind. Revelling in every gay and glittering sight, and sweet and musical sound, he meddles not with the deep secrets of the heart, or the heroic struggles of strong and noble minds. Yet, if Moore is not an orb of Shakspearian or Byronic lustre, he shines brightly near. He is, indeed, to Shakspeare what Anacreon was to Homer.

Thomas Moore, the son of a grocer in Aungier-street, Dublin, was born in 1780. Like Pope, he lisped in numbers, and at thirteen years of age had written printed sonnets. Just at the proper moment for Moore, Catholic students were permitted to enter the Dublin University, and the youthful poet took advantage of the relaxation. He could not obtain a degree, but his verses obtained notice and praise. The horizon was now at once brightening and darkening over Ireland, as the glare and the smoke of the great Revolution ascended the firmament. Young Moore, as might be expected, became a democrat, and hymned the independence of the Green Isle, and wrote in feeling verse of Emmet. In his twentieth year Moore proceeded to London to study law, and to publish his translation of the poems of Anacreon. The latter was dedicated to the Prince Regent, per favour of Earl Moira; and with its appearance commenced the cosmopolite existence of Moore. In 1807 Mr. Thomas Little published his lucubrations. "Virtue, with her zone loosened," as he phrased it, was more tolerantly received in these Régence days than she would be now; but Moore lived to be heartily ashamed of the brilliant escapade. A couple of years afterwards the poet stepped into place—a place utterly unfitted for him, in Bermuda—where he promptly appointed a deputy made a run through the States, and returned not pleased with the rough republicanism of the western world. A couple of volumes of odes

Sir— I think it right even this late, to acknowledge and thank you for a copy of the Illustrated London News, which I take for granted, came from your office, and in which it was not little gratifying to me to see mention having been duly accepted by the wood-cuts. Whether either myself or any of my family discovered the very kind and (I should hope for your paper's sake) interesting notice which you have done me this honour to take of our poor old homely cottage at Mayfield, by family circumstances has been sadly thinned since then, but the pious feelings that it, I feel and thank you for your kindness.

I have the honour to be

and epistles commemorated his transatlantic travels. In 1806 occurred the well-remembered quarrel and bloodless duel with Jeffrey; and the repetition of the story, in "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," first led to a quarrel, and thence to an enduring friendship between Byron and Moore. Some serious satiric poetry, in which Catullus aspired to be Juvenal, appeared, and then Moore tried with more success a lighter strain. The "Twopenny Post-bag" set all the world, even the victims, laughing. The piquancy of Moore's political satire is admirable. His hits are home; while, from the flow of the nicely-balanced verse, every stanza reads as if the whole structure of the language had been expressly arranged for the convenience of the poet.

Moore commenced in 1807, and continued till as late as 1831, the publication of those "Irish Melodies" which will know no decrease in their popularity until the very taste for harmony and song shall itself fade away. Vain is it now, and truly vain would it be here, to enter upon a criticism of these all-cherished "Melodies;"—vain to show that Shakspeare, when he fashioned love songs, spoke with truer, deeper, pathos; or that Burns, when upon the same theme, in greater strain, called around him the night with its raven plumage to shade the intensity of those transports which made him write with angel pen.

Moore had none of this force, nor would it have suited his purpose. His songs had wonderful combination with the beautiful music of his country—a music which, to use his own words, has "the tone of defiance succeeded by the languor of despondency; a burst of turbulence dying away into softness. The sorrows of one moment lost in the levity of the next, and all that romantic mixture of mirth and sadness, which is naturally produced by the effects of a lively temperament to take off or forget the wrongs which lie upon it." And oh! how Ireland has loved these melodies of Moore! They came upon her in a time of despondency to touch the chord of her pride, and warm the life-blood that was chill about her heart. Her gratitude has been as lasting as her satisfaction. The people of the green isle may differ and dispute on almost every thing, but there is no diversity in their ardent, undying admiration of Thomas Moore. England has largely shared in this enthusiasm, and Scotland too. It may be truly said, that throughout the realm there scarcely passes one social evening, one convivial meeting, where music will not at once bring with it the melodies of Moore. In Italy, in France, in Russia, in Persia, everywhere where harmony has its devotees, there will you hear these Irish melodies, either translated or in their original language. Allowing the truth of this, it would be as futile as it is unsuitable, at a moment when the poet's soul of music has but just fled, to carp and comment on those productions which have given their author the whole breadth and depth of civilisation for his fame.

In 1817 another brilliant work of Moore appeared. Messrs. Longman, the publishers, agreed to give three thousand guineas for an Eastern poem. Moore retired to the banks of the Dove, imbued himself with Oriental reading, and in three years produced "Lalla Rookh." Its success was splendid. It struck a new key, and poured upon the world a dazzling flood of gorgeous Eastern illustration and imagery. Old Orientalists could not understand how such a poem could have been written by a man who had never ridden on an elephant, or reclined beneath a palm-tree; while the extraordinary mingling of glittering pageantry with a chilling, tame, luxurious warmth of idea, took by storm the dazzled brains of the British public.

After the literary triumph of "Lalla Rookh" Moore went twice abroad; the first time with the poet Rogers, the second with Lord John Russell, when he proceeded to Genoa, and at Venice visited Lord Byron, with whom his friendship continued unbroken till death divided them. Returning from Rome, Moore took up his abode in Paris, and resided there till 1822. He produced at this time "The Loves of the Angels," and the "Fables of the Holy Alliance."

Soon after his coming back to England he settled in graceful retirement at a cottage called Sloperton, in the immediate vicinity of the beautiful demesne of Bowood, the seat of the Marquis of Lansdowne. Here he passed the greater portion of the rest of his life in the midst of his friends, the charm and delight of them all. Lord Lansdowne will be for ever associated with the fame of Moore, as are Glencairn with that of Burns, and Southampton with that of Shakspeare. Bowood, with its splendid library, its lovely walks, and its princely hospitalities, was at all times open to the poet, and here he spent the happiest hours of his declining years.

In 1825 Moore appeared as a prose writer. The life of Sheridan was his first biography. That of Byron, infinitely superior to the other, came out in 1830; and the following year he published the "Memoirs of Lord Edward Fitzgerald." Besides these biographical efforts, Moore wrote more than one controversial and historical work; and in 1827 he produced "The Epicurean," a prose story, intended to have been verse, in many respects the most elevated work of his pen. Love here becomes more spiritualized, than she had been with him before; and the whole tone and tenor of the romance are of an inspiriting and ennobling character.

In later days Moore occasionally contributed squibs, with much of the old sparkle, on passing events of the day, principally to the columns of the Morning Chronicle. It is also known that he had made considerable progress in a diary of his life, when unhappily, he had to experience the lot that had before befallen another genius of Ireland, Dean Swift: darkness came down upon that brain so long and so brightly lit by the fires of wit and fancy. Of late years the poet's existence was but physical, so that his departure, which occurred on the 26th ultimo, brought the less of sorrow with it. Mrs. Moore survives her husband. She was a Miss Dyke—a lady of beauty, amiability, and much firmness and decision of character. None of the four children of the poet survive him. One son for some time was a pupil with a French translator of his father's verse, M. Bertrand, a professor of high literary fame at, and now Mayor of, Caen, in Normandy. A son of Moore's died in the French military service at Algiers.

We have scarcely alluded to the politics of the poet, but we cannot quit the subject without recording that throughout his life he was a staunch and consistent Liberal. His birth, his connexions, and his early dearest associations led him into close and cordial alliance with those whose policy, afloat from extremes, suited both his gentle disposition and his violent love of freedom. Under these circumstances, the pension conferred on him by a Whig Government was the most honourable mark of approbation for him. Moore spake as he felt of the wrongs of Erin, and he playfully satirized the foibles of the opponents of his own opinions: still, his very political bias was upright and gentlemanly; he cherished neither harm nor hate; the kindness of his soul was felt as he said or did, and he true y warmly cherished those themes he doated on—the amenities of social life, the ardour of patriotism, and the softness of woman's love. The lines which he himself paraphrased for the tomb of that ancient poet, whom he resembled as closely as the better Christian can the baser heathen, might well appear to his own memory. We conclude with them:—

> O stranger, if Anacreon's shell
> Has ever taught thy heart to swell
> With passion's thrilling pleasure's sigh,
> In pity turn, as wandering nigh,
> And drop thy goblet's richest tear
> In exquisite libation here!

The remains of this gifted poet were on Wednesday consigned to their last resting-place, in a vault on the north side of the churchyard of Bromham, a village lying half a mile to the left of the turnpike-road leading from Devizes to Chippenham, and four miles from the former place. The stone covering the poet's ashes records the deaths of two of his children:—"Anastasia Mary Moore, born March 16, 1813, died March 8, 1829; also her brother, John Russell Moore, died Nov. 28, 1842, aged 19 years." When the popularity of Moore as a writer is considered, it is a matter of surprise that more persons were not present at the funeral; but beyond the elders of the village, who usually congregate on such occasions, there were but few, and these for the most part, from the neighbouring towns of Devizes and Melksham. The hearse, containing the body, and followed by one mourning coach only, containing R. H. Brabant, Esq., M.D.; the Rev. H. Drury, G. C. Keary, Esq., and the representative of H. F. Talbot, Esq., J.P., and friends of the deceased, arrived at the church soon after eleven. The service was performed by the Rev. E. T. Edgell. The coffin, covered with black cloth, and bearing the simple inscription, "THOMAS MOORE, born May 28, 1779; died February 26, 1852, aged 72 years," was lowered into the vault. The spectators quitted the spot, and the churchyard soon assumed its usual quiet appearance.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Beneath the portrait of Moore, upon the preceding page, is a view of Sloperton, whence is dated the accompanying letter, addressed to the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, February 22, 1843. The Engraving therein referred to shows Moore's cottage at Mayfield, a secluded village on the Staffordshire bank of the river Dove, about two miles from Ashbourne. (See the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, No. 31.) An Engraving of Sloperton, with some interesting details of the poet's retirement, appeared in No. 51. The birthplace of Moore, 12, Aungier-street, Dublin, engraved also upon the previous page, is from a recent Sketch: here lived Moore's father, who was a grocer, and the same business is still carried on in the premises. The poet, some years since, pointed out to a friend of our Artist the above house as his birthplace; and the room in which he first saw the light is still shown.

JAMES BURNES, ESQ.

THIS gentleman died at his residence, Brunton-place, Edinburgh, on the 20th ult. He was the son of the late James Burnes, solicitor, in Montrose, and was the son of James Burnes, the elder brother of William, the father of Robert Burns, the poet. Mr. Burnes, the subject of this notice, married, early, Elizabeth, daughter of Adam Gleig, Esq., Provost of Montrose, by whom he had a numerous family, one of whom, Sir Alexander and Charles, were the first victims of the fatal outbreak at Cabul, in November, 1841.

ARCHBISHOP MURRAY.

THE Most Rev. Daniel Murray, D.D., Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, was one of those ministers of God whose virtuous character, amiable disposition, and dignified bearing bring peace and good-will to all Christian men. During the forty years he exercised his episcopal functions, he won and retained the love and respect of all people in Ireland. This venerable and excellent Prelate was the son of respectable parents. He was born in the parish of Rathcross, near Enniscorthy, in the county of Wexford, on the 16th of April, 1768. Having received the rudiments of education from the Very Rev. Dr. Betagh, he set out, while yet in boyhood, for Spain, then one of those countries which opened their seminaries for the reception of the youth of persecuted Ireland that education which was denied them at home. In the Irish College of the University of Salamanca he acquired a sound knowledge of theology and the sacred sciences, which, in the maturity of later years, he imparted to a host of high degree. He was consecrated priest in the year 1790, at Salamanca, shortly after which he returned to Ireland. He commenced his ministry as curate of a country Wicklow parish. He shortly removed thence to Dublin, where he successively filled the post of curate in the chapels of St. Paul, Arran-quay; St. Andrew, Townsend-street; and intimately of St. Mary, Liffey-street.

Dr. Troy, who preceded Dr. Murray in the Roman Catholic see of Dublin, having occupied the Episcopal chair for above thirty years, and having been wasted down by age and infirmity, Pius VII nominated Dr. Murray his coadjutor; and, in the month of Nov., 1809, the latter was consecrated Archbishop of Hieropolis in partibus infidelium, with right of succession to the see of Dublin on the decease of the venerable prelate whom he was called on to assist. For fourteen years Dr. Murray discharged the onerous duties of coadjutor to Dr. Troy, and upon his death, which took place in the year 1823, he succeeded him in the see of Dublin.

During the struggle for Catholic Emancipation, Dr. Murray was distinguished for his opposition to the veto, and his uncompromising attachment to the liberties of his Church. Nominated by the Irish Bishops, he journeyed twice to Rome to protest against Quarantotti's rescript submitting to the veto, and also, the first time, to congratulate Pius VII. on his liberation from captivity.

In 1825 his Grace was, with the Right Rev. Dr. Doyle and other prelates, examined before a committee of the House of Lords on Catholic doctrine and discipline. After the passing of the Catholic Emancipation in 1829, he withdrew from political life. On the appointment of the new Commissioners of Education, he was nominated one of that body, the duties of which he continued assiduously to discharge up to the last. It was soon after that the attack which terminated in his decease.

The Prelate was during his praiseworthy career ever held in high favour and esteem by each successive Viceroy of Ireland; and, on the occasion of the Queen's visit to Dublin, he was one of the chosen guests who had the honour of dining with her Majesty at the Castle. It is reported that the Queen expressed at the time how much she was struck by the venerable and saint-y appearance of the Archbishop.

To the deep regret of all parties, the most Rev. Dr. Murray died on the 26th ultimo, at his residence in Eccles-square, Dub in. His demise, which was somew. at sudden, is supposed to have been accelerated by the fatigue he underwent the previous Monday in assisting at the celebrat on of a service in the Church of St. Francis Xavier for the repose of the soul of the late Richard Lalor Sheil.

SIR JOHN CUNINGHAM FAIRLIE, BART., OF FAIRLIE AND ROBERTLAND.

THE death of this Baronet, the seventh in succession, occurred at Fairlie House, Ayrshire, on the 26th ult. Sir John was born 29th July, 1779, and married, 8th August, 1808, Janet-Lucretia, daughter of John Wallace of Kelly, Esq., a lineal descendant of the ancient Scottish family to which belonged the renowned Sir William Wallace. The Baronetcy enjoyed by the deceased was conferred, in 1630, on David Cuninghame of Robertland, a descendant of the noble House of Glencairn, who held the office of Master of the Works to King James VI. The additional name of Fairlie was adopted by Sir John's father, Sir William, the fifth Baronet, in right of his mother, Margaret, daughter of William Fairlie, Esq., of that Ilk.

The only issue, Sir John is succeeded by his brot -r, now Sir Charles Cuninghame Fairlie, Bart, who married, in 1806, Fanny, the sec nd daughter of the late Sir John Call, Bart, of Whitefield, Cornwall.

COLONEL CRADOCK.

SHELDON CRADOCK, Esq., of Hartforth, near Richmond, Yorks, was a Colonel of the North York Militia (previously raised by Lord Dundas, father of the present Earl of Zetland, and now by the Duke of Leeds), died on the 15th ult. in his 79th year of his age. Colonel Cradock received Commission from the Prince Regent, in the Reform Bill of 1832, but declined accepting the honour, and his brother, Colonel Cradock, who had a great reputation built at home and abroad; his fine breed of short-horned Durham cattle being well known in the country and the colonies.

Col. Cradock was representative of the ancient and knightly line of the Cradocks of Durham, Yorkshire, Staffordshire, and Somerset, The present Lord Howden is a branch of this family. Col. Cradock was an excellent landlord.

ROBERT CARY ELWES, ESQ., OF GREAT BILLING, COUNTY OF NORTHAMPTON.

THE death of this gentleman, one of the great landed proprietors of Northamptonshire, occurred at Bigby, county of Lincoln, on the 10th instant. He was in his 80th year. The family of Elwes, of Great Billing, descends from Geoffrey Elwes, alderman of London, uncle of Sir Gervase Elwaies, Lieutenant of the Tower in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and Governor of Jersey during the same. From one of its younger sons sprang the baronets Elwes, whose representative, John Elwes, was so well known as "Elwes the Miser," and so distinguished for integrity, generosity, and parsimony.

Mr. Elwes, whose decease we record, inherited from his father, in 1782, the lands of Throcking, in Herts; but, in 1799, he sold that property to George Wood, Esq., of London, and purchased from Lord Frederick Cavendish the splendid mansion and estate of Great Billing. He married, first, 12th October, 1797, Caroline, daughter of Charles, first Lord Yarborough, and by her (who died in 1815) had issue four sons and two daughters, the eldest of the former being the present Charles Cary Elwes, Esq., of Great Billing. He married, secondly, in 1814, Jane Marianne, only daughter of the Rev. Richard Sykes, of West Ella, county of York, by whom he had four sons.

GEORGE DOWDESWELL, ESQ., OF REDMARLEY, COUNTY OF WORCESTER.

MR. DOWDESWELL died on the 6th inst., at his residence, the Down House, Redmarley, aged 87. Early in life he went to the East Indies, in the civil service, and eventually rose to the elevated situation of a member of the Supreme Council, acting, for some months during the absence of the Governor-General from Calcutta, as Deputy-Governor of Fort William and Vice-President in Council. His father, George Dowdeswell, M.D., was brother of the Right Hon. Edmund Dowdeswell, of Pal. Court, M.P., Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Newcastle-Rockingham Administration, whose epitaph by Edmund Burke is so much admired.

WILLIAM HENRY OXBERRY.

THIS popular comedian was the son of the once eminent actor Oxberry, and was born in Brownlow-street, Bloomsbury, on the 23rd of April, 1808. He was educated at Merchant Tailors' school; and subsequently studied with an artist, and in a lawyer's office. At length he was apprenticed to a surgeon; and was asked by Sir Astley Cooper, during an examination, whether, when he saw his father convulse the audience with laughter, it was no ambition to tread in his shoes?" No doubt he did, for he soon after made his essay at the Rawthmell-street private theatre, in the character of Abel Drugger, which he performed to the Captain Cuttle of Mr. Matthews. His public commencement was deferred till the 17th March, 1825, for the Olympic, in the part of Sam Steeper, in the farce of "The Hash Road to Marriage." He remained not long there, however, before he took a situation under Mr. Leigh Hunt, on the Examiner. Shortly afterwards he returned to the stage, and went on a provincial tour, and finally appeared in London in 1832 at the Strand Theatre, as Mathews, in "The Hunchback." Since that period Mr. Oxberry was seen with credit at turn at every theatre in the metropolis. On the 11th Dec., 1834, he married Miss Ellen Macombe Lancaster. He also became manager of the English Opera-House, but was not successful. The loss of his wife, too, was a sad misfortune His subsequent career was not prosperous. Lately, owing to ill-health, his engagements were few, and his circumstances much impoverished. His early friend. Mr. Frank Matthews, took a great interest in his affairs, and very recently represented his case to the eminent manager, Charles Mathews, who most generously volunteered to engage him. At the period poor Oxberry was literally starving. Consumption rendered at last all efforts vain: Oxberry died on the 28th ult. Mr. C Mathews, determined that his benevolent intention shall not be entirely defeated by the death of its object, proposes, we understand, to devote one night's salary of himself and each other employée at the Lyceum Theatre as agree to it, for the benefit of Mr. Oxberry's three children. Oxberry was interred yesterday, by his wife's side, in Kensal Green Cemetery.

A special probate of the will, with five codicils, of his Grace the most noble Henry Pelham Duke of Newcastle, K.G., has been granted by the Prerogative Court of Canterbury to the present Duke of Newcastle (late Earl of Lincoln), the brother and sole executor. The will bears date 1st April, 1814, is of great length, being contained in twenty-eight sheets of paper, closely written; the codicils have been much altered, and no less than eight affidavits were made in support of them. The personal estates in the counties of Nottingham and York are devised to the present Duke; and those in Wales, as well as the Worksop and Shire Oaks estates, his Grace has bequeathed to his son Charles. With the late Duke came into power the branch of the family of Pelham-Clinton, and it is procuring £25,000 per annum, but which he raised to upwards of £40,000 per annum, and there are estates connected with the succession of the value of £400,000. The personalty under the province of Canterbury was valued at £600,000.

The will of the late Rev. E. Ellerton, D.D., Senior Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford University, has just been proved, by which he leaves to the president and scholars of Magdalen College, a freehold estate at Lipscombe, to found two new scholarships, and for the purchase of books for the college library. Also bequeaths to six parishes a legacy of £10 to each, one-half to be laid out in the purchase of Bibles and Prayer-books, the other in bread. To the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge £200; and bequeaths to the Rev. C. Townsend, in addition to a legacy to him as an executor with the Rev. John Calcott. There are numerous bequests to his relatives and friends. The residue is divided among nephews and nieces. The personalty was valued at £8000.

BEQUESTS TO CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS.—Miss Anne Davies, of Penmorn, in Anglesea, county Carnarvon, has bequeathed to the missions to the Roman Catholics of Ireland, £500; Church Pastoral Aid Society, £500; National Benevolent Institution, £500, London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, £500; Church Missionary Orphan Asylum, Wanstead, 40 guineas; and Church Missionary Society, 20 guineas.—The late Miss Sarah Hamilton, of Clapham, has left to the London Missionary Society 19 guineas; and to the Church Missionary, the British and Foreign Bible, and the London City Missionary, 10 guineas each.—Mr. John West, of Bilston, Staffordshire, has left the Military and Naval Benefit Society, £50; and to the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, £50.—A legacy of 100 guineas from the late Joseph Roberts, Esq., has been left to the Royal Dispensary for Diseases of the Ear, Dean-street, Soho.—The late Rev. THE "AMAZON."—The arrival of the last West India steamer, without bringing any more news of the crew and passengers of the Amazon, and the announcement of the fact that the barque which was supposed to be near the burning vessel has since spoken two days after the catastrophe, and communicated no intelligence that she had any of the missing crew or passengers on board, have almost destroyed the last vestige of hope that any more are saved. Mrs. Symons, the wife of the unfortunate commander, has left Southampton for Newcastle, her brothers are some of the most prominent merchants in Jamaica. Miss Brady, the sister of the Admiralty agent, is, it is feared, incurably afflicted. The shock and loss sustained have proved too much for her mind and frame. Miss Smith, one of the passengers who has by her heroic conduct been the means of her own and other lives being preserved, is still at the Mayor of Southampton's residence at Winchester, where she has found a hospitable asylum. She has been treated with the greatest kindness also by the nobility, gentry, and clergy of the neighbourhood of Winchester. She is occasionally afflicted with hysterical affection, the result of great mental excitement and agony. A Sunday or two ago a report was given out in Southampton to the effect that twenty-a gut more of the Amazon people had been saved. This report flew through the town, and into the countries, from whence it was even announced from some of the pulpits. The friends and relatives of the lost were in a state of the greatest excitement, but the report turned out a cruel hoax. The Amazon fund now amounts to £6500.

FEMALE EMIGRATION SOCIETY.—On Saturday an interesting band of emigrants, composed of fifty young women, under the superintendence of Mr. Hasey, secretary to the society, was despatched to Australia by the ship Fortitude, from Gravesend. They were accompanied on board by Mrs. Sidney Herbert and Mrs. Stuart Wortley, the patronesses of this most benevolent undertaking, and their voyage promises to be taken to provide them with the necessary comforts on their long voyage. These two distinguished ladies also provided each of the emigrants with a pair of boots and a new dress, and saw them repaired with a substantial dinner of roast beef and plum-pudding previous to their departure.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE GREAT EXHIBITION.—A letter dated from "the Palace of Westminster, 21st February, 1852," from her Majesty's Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851, has been addressed to Sir Thomas Fremantle, Bart., the chairman of the Board of Customs, conveying the thanks of the Commissioners to the board for the valuable assistance rendered them in all matters relating to the Custom-house arrangements in connexion with the Exhibition; and it says, in order to mark their sense of the manner in which those officers have executed the duties entrusted to them, under the general superintendence of Mr. Rolls, her Majesty's Commissioners have voted to each of them the amount of gratuity of £937 10s. Tegetmeier, Commissioner of the port of London; Mr. Rolls, landing surveyor, £150 to Mr. Fairman, general manager and comptroller of accounts, and other lesser sums in proportion to the whose of the subordinate officers and clerks who were employed at the Great Exhibition building.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.—The annual distribution of gifts awarded by the governors of Christ's Hospital to young men who had been educated at that magnificent national institution, and who had subsequently entered upon their various terms of apprenticeship, took place on Tuesday morning. The number who presented themselves at the committee-room amounted to nearly 150; the gifts were from £5 to £10 each. The various recipients evinced the utmost gratitude for the presents they had received, and soon after quitted the walls of Christ's Hospital to pursue their respective avocations.

REFORM CONFERENCE.—On Tuesday and Wednesday, meetings of a large body of delegates from various Reform Associations throughout the country were held in St. Martin's Hall, Long-acre. Mr. Hume presided on the principal occasion, viz. the evening meeting of Wednesday. Among the speakers on both days were Sir Joshua Walmsley, M.P., Mr. Torrens M'Cullagh, M.P., Mr. W. J. Fox, M.P., Mr. J. B. Smith, M.P., Mr. Lawrence Heyworth, M.P., Mr. Gesch, M.P., Mr. G. Thompson, M.P., and Mr. Napier. The object of the conference was to promote a comprehensive measure of Parliamentary Reform, the present orials particularly calling for increased exertions on the part of all reformers. The following was the most important resolution agreed to:—"That this meeting believes radical Parliamentary reform to be the great practical want of the day; and while desiring the maintenance of the Free Trade, records its conviction that freedom of trade would have been impregnable if the suffrage had been placed upon a truly national basis; and that, in common with other equally important questions, Free Trade can only be finally decided when the House of Commons is made a real representation of the people." Mr. E. Jones and several Chartist were present at each of the meetings, and there was much difficulty in preventing dissension and uproarious interruption to the proceedings.

PATRIOTS' PENSION SOCIETY.—On Monday the annual general meeting of this society took place at the London Tavern; Mr. Bloomfield, in the absence of R. Taylor, Esq., F.R.S., the treasurer, in the chair. The report set forth that the society had been established nearly a quarter of a century, during which period it had extended aid to upwards of 160 of the poor, aged, and deserving in the trade. The subscription at the last annual dinner was not more than £180, much less than the average; but the annual subscription had exceeded those of the previous year by £40, whilst there had been a considerable diminution of the expenses. The invested property of the society was now £7951 16s. 6d. The death of five pensioners during the year had occasioned the vacancies to be filled up on this occasion. By the death of Henry Fley, Esq., late of Shoe lane, the society had acquired a legacy of £2950. The receipts of the year, including a previous balance of £45 14s. 9d., amounted to £1069 3s. 4d., of which a balance remained of £80 15s. 6d. The report having been adopted, it was resolved, after some discussion, that, in consequence of the above legacy, an additional pensioner, to be called the "Fley Pensioner," should be annually elected.

THE SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY.—The thirty-first half-yearly general meeting was held on Thursday, at the Bridge-house Hotel, London-bridge; James M'Gregor, Esq., in the chair. The report having been read, a dividend of 3½ per cent. was recommended by the directors, being 10s. 6d. per £30 share, thereby leaving a balance of £4269 2s. 10d. in hand. The report was adopted.

ENGINEERS' MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.—The annual meeting of members of the above society was held at the head office, 345, Strand, on Tuesday afternoon. W. F. Dobson, Esq., the chairman of the society, presided. From the directors' report it appeared that during the year 1851, 286 proposals for assurance had been submitted to the board, of which 229 had been completed, assuring the sum of £72,400, and producing annual premiums to the amount of £2498 10s. 6d. Forty-one proposals for the sum of £11,150 had been declined, and nineteen, for the sum of £9250, stood over for further consideration or completion. The claims by death had been only £180. The annual income derivable from the premiums upon the 1403 policies in force on the 31st December last, was £12,574 11s. 10d. The report gave general satisfaction.

OPPOSITION TO THE MILITIA BILL.—On Saturday, at the meeting of the Marylebone vestry, Mr. Greenwell brought up and read a memorial, signed by 70 ratepayers, against the Local Militia Bill. They objected that it would be placing a power in the hands of the Government of arming their then fact cities for involving themselves in the affairs of the Continent, and so incur the danger of a renewal of the war, such as this country was engaged in for nine years previously to 1815, by which it became burdened with more than 200 millions of debt. It would be an invasion of our civil liberties, and a check upon our social and moral progress, when 10,000 young men, between the ages of twenty and twenty-three, are to be withdrawn from their employments, subjected to military discipline and martial law in all its fearful severity.

OVERSEERS' MASTERS.—A large meeting of omnibus proprietors was held on Saturday at the Cranbourne Hotel, in reference to the disputes with the servants, Mr. A. Lines in the chair. Mr. Gray said the masters present were aware that a midnight meeting of the men had been held in the immediate neighbourhood. There had arisen misstatements made between the men and masters, a resolution contradicting the statement of tyrannical conduct on the part of the masters which was alleged at the midnight meeting. Mr. Hartley seconded the resolution. Several men were much further off than they ought to be from the kerb, which had to stand rain, and snow at all hours of the night, and the pleasure of which, in a tunnel, to say nothing of hot ashes. (Hear, hear.) They were now at that time police, who did duty at night only. A gentleman present (he was a member of the association for which Tait (the chairman of the midnight meeting) had been coachman. He had actually declared that he had worked more than a day, when the mileage on his omnibus, as shown by the taximeter, was only sixty miles. If he was out sixteen hours, it was not the master's fault. The chairman then put the resolution, which was carried unanimously, and, after a vote of thanks, the meeting separated.

CALMEL GREY'S-YARD RAGGED SCHOOL.—On Wednesday the anniversary meeting of the friends and promoters of this establishment took place at the Marylebone Literary and Scientific Institution, Edward-street, Portman-square. The Earl of Shaftesbury, who was in the chair, stated that the ragged-school movement was then in circumstances of much difficulty. He feared that the institutions had now reached their zenith. A report was read, which stated that the school was established in 1836, and that during the period 3000 children had participated in the benefits arising from it. Pecuniary assistance had been rendered, and a clothing club and a lending library, and weekly meetings were held for the gratuitous instruction of the children. The annual expenditure upon the schools was £300, and there was now a balance due to the treasurer amounting to £91. The Earl of Waldegrave and Admiral Harcourt having severally addressed the meeting, the business terminated with a vote of thanks to the noble chairman.

EXPENSE OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.—From a Parliamentary paper just issued we learn that the sum raised for the maintenance of the metropolitan police force amounts to £472,256 19s. 9d. Of this sum, £66,000, in round numbers, constituted a balance from last year's accounts; £397,000 was raised from the different parishes of the metropolis; £27,000 was the quota of the consolidated fund; and £41,000 have been paid for special services by private and public offices, theatres, &c., among which £17,000 was contributed by the Board of Commissioners of the Great Exhibition. This sum was spent for the pay, clothing, and equipment of the police force, £362,800; salaries of commissioners, receiver, surveyor, &c., £5000; station and section-houses, £31,000; medical and funeral expenses, £3000; fuel and light, £11,500; printed allowances, £5000; with other miscellaneous sources of expenditure, making a total of £472,000—leaving a balance for the next year of £50 000. The superannuations that have occurred during the year £2,000 in the shape of deductions from the constables' pay, stoppages during sickness, fines for misconduct, &c., make £25000 of fines on drunken persons, &c., at the police courts. From this sum £16,000 has been paid in superannuations, and £1000 in gratuities to 29 constables. The expense of the police courts amounts to £44,000—the principal item, of course, being the salary of one magistrate at £1200 a year, and 22 other magistrates at £600 per annum each. An appendix gives the sum contributed by each separate parish in the metropolitan district.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—The births for the last week registered in London were—Boys, 1331; girls, 1307: total, 2638. In seven corresponding weeks of the years 1845-51, the average number was 1420. The deaths in the same period were Males, 944; females, 925: total, 1869, being 75 fewer than in the previous week. By the official report it appears that the total cases recorded last week to "diseases of the respiratory organs" number 152. Some the corrected average is 238; they are distributed thus: 6 caused by laryngitis, laryngismus stridulus, 3 pleurisy, 89 bronchitis, 67 pneumo. is, 21 asthma, and 7 by other unspecified diseases of the chest. Of the 1869 deaths in the week, 1 died of a class) was fatal to 143 persons, hooping-cough (in the epidemic) to 7. The number of deaths ascribed to zymotic or epidemic diseases was, last week, 208, the corrected average being 218. Small-pox was fatal to 24 children and 5 adults, in 6 of which cases it is stated that vaccination had been previously performed. Measles was fatal in 11 cases, scarlatina in 22, croup in 7, diarrhœa and dysentery in 24, influenza in 5, typhus, remittent fever, rheumatic fever, &c., in 51, erysipelas in 9.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—At the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, the mean daily reading of the barometer was above 30 inches on all the days of the week except the last; it was highest on Monday, when it was 30.305 inches; on Sunday it was 30.3[illegible] inches; on Tuesday, 30.3[illegible] inches. The mean of the week was 30.160 inches. The mean temperature of the week was [illegible] degrees, which is [illegible] degrees above the average of the last seven years. The mean daily temperature was below the average on only [illegible] days of the week, namely, on Monday. The wind blew from the N.E. till Saturday, when it changed to S.W.

P. C.—You attempted solution is an ingenious blunder. Look at the position again.

JUDY, JACK OF SHREWSBURY, PUNCH.—Your solution of Mr. Bolton's fine stratagem is not perfect.

NEMO.—The Chess [illegible] are only paltry imitations of the "Staunton Chess-men." The latter are contained in an elegant saratophagus of black cocoa-nut-wood, with a label and stop-water on the bottom, and are accompanied by a figure treatise on the game, written expressly for the proprietors by Mr. Staunton.

LYNX.—We have not received a dozen correct solutions of Mr. Bolton's Problem, No. 423 to K 8. It shall be reported on next week.

D. B.—The many answers of our correspondents have fallen into, of sending their problems to half a dozen Chess periodicals at the same time, would certainly be more honoured in the breach than the observance. In five cases out of the six their predecessors are too late for the public eye, as most of these publications are never seen by more than fifty players, and the practice of looking to quantity rather than quality is fatal to the success of the composer.

R. D. M. It strikes us that "Judy" should have played a Black Knight, instead of a Black Pawn, at the K 8 th, in her Problem in the C P C for March.

And, as White persisted in repeating the check, the game was given up as a drawn battle.

Notes by Major Jaenisch.

* Speaking of this game, the Major remarks:' Among the different parties which I played at this period of my travels, this was the only one conduct d with regularity and sustained care by both players. My adversary, an officer in the Prussian service, is known to be one of the strongest German players. The character of his play presents a remarkable resemblance to that of Von Heydebrandt der Lasa.'

(a) This attack is regarded in theory as inferior to P to K 5th. We may see, however, its success from the ingenious combinations which M. Von der Goltz has effected.

(b) White prefers the sacrifice of a Pawn, because through it he retains his command to keep up an invulnerable array of small attacks.

(c) This appears to us the best defence in every way; it relieves himself from the petty embarrassment in subjoined note. By renouncing the gained Pawn, he acquires a very strong position on the Queen's side of the field.

(d) The capture of this Pawn was very hazardous, and would have compromised White's game if he had not adroitly availed himself of that problem.

(e) The best way to prevent the threatened move of R to K R 4th and at the same time to give room to the Kt.

(f) Playing 34. P to Q B 6th, to sacrifice a Rook for the Kt when the latter gave check, would, to all appearance, have given the game to Black.

THE READING AND BERKSHIRE CHESS CLUB.—We are gratified to hear that the committee of this flourishing institution have unanimously agreed to alter the arrangements of the annual festival in accordance with the suggestion we threw out. For this purpose, it has been determined that the second shall take place on the evening of the 16th instant, and that the [illegible] shall be continued by a code of [illegible] day; but we regret to say, that on and [illegible] 11th. As some of the finest players in the kingdom have signified their intention of being present there is every reason to expect the assemblage this year will more than equal that of any previous one.

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS.—The standing orders of the British Electric Telegraph Company's Bill, for obtaining compulsory powers to use railways, &c., have been complied with. The directors of the British Company have entered into agreements with the Lancashire and Yorkshire, the London, Northern, and Stockton and Darlington Railway Companies, and are actively engaged in laying down their wires between Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, and Hull, and from Leeds to Newcastle. A large portion of line is expected to be opened in the course of a month or six weeks. These telegraphs, of course, require to be connected with London; and it is with this view that the British Company are seeking, at the hands of Parliament, power to enable them to use the several lines of railway (giving them compensation) intervening between these places.

THE FATAL INUNDATION AT HOLMFIRTH

After a patient investigation into the whole circumstances attending this dreadful catastrophe, a coroner's jury have felt themselves constrained to pass a heavy censure upon the commissioners under whose management the Holme reservoirs were constructed and worked. On Friday, the 27th ult., after a sitting of five days duration, the following emphatic verdict was handed in to the coroner by the foreman, on behalf of himself and fourteen fellow-urymen:

We find that the deceased persons came to their deaths by drowning, caused by the bursting of the Bilberry reservoir. We also find that the Bilberry reservoir was defective in its original construction, and that the commissioners, the engineer, and the overlooker were greatly culpable in not seeing to the proper regulation of the works; and we also find that the commissioners, in permitting the Bilberry reservoir to remain for several years in a dangerous state, with a full knowledge thereof, and not lowering the waste pit, have been guilty of great and culpable negligence; and we regret that the reservoir being under the management of a corporation prevents us bringing in a verdict of manslaughter, as we are convinced that the gross and culpable negligence of the commissioners would have subjected them to such a verdict had they been in the position of an individual or firm. We also hope that the Legislature will take into its most serious consideration the propriety of making provision for the protection of the lives and properties of her Majesty's subjects exposed to danger from reservoirs placed by corporations similar to those under the charge of the Holme Reservoir Commissioners.

The evidence of the various witnesses disclosed the existence of so large an amount of neglect and carelessness, that the severity of the above finding can be no matter of surprise: indeed, it is impossible to avoid a feeling of regret that the Commissioners cannot be made legally responsible for the heavy suffering and loss which has been entailed upon innocent individuals through their fatal recklessness. Of the degree of blame attached to these gentlemen a fair estimate may be gathered from the very clear and valuable report made by Captain Moody, the Government Inspector, (upon which, no doubt, the verdict of the jury was in a great measure framed). After expressing his opinion that the immediate cause of the catastrophe was the middle portion of the embankment, or dam, being lower than the top of the waste water pit (as shown in the accompanying Engraving), the gallant Captain said:—

This waste pit is designed to carry off the waste or flood water, but the top of the embankment having sunk below the top of the pit, and being suffered to remain so, the flood waters had no proper or sufficient escape, but went over the dam, which, as a necessary consequence, gave way. In the evidence before you mention has been made of a spring, of different leaks, and defective workmanship, but so long as the level of the dam was below the level of the waste pit, and the flood suffered to pour over the top of an embankment of this kind, it would give way, though there were no springs, no leaks, and though the best quality of "puddling" was put in as water tight as possible. It would give way, though not so instantaneously, from top to bottom; it would be lower in its operation, but still quick enough to form a flood of terribly destructive effects in its course.

After describing the mode of constructing reservoirs of a similar character to the "Bilberry," and pointing out, in the formation of the dam, that the best materials only should be used, Captain Moody said:—

In the construction of the Bilberry dam this careful selection has not been made. The material is similar on both sides, and loose in its nature. The inner portion is carriable through the water, and, instead of the part next to the puddle-dam being closely rammed, and almost puddle in its character, a dry, open, rubble wall, or backing, appears to have been carried up from the bottom, on both sides of the puddle-dam, inviting the water, as it were, to scatter on the whole inner surface of the puddle, and to escape with greater ease at any leaks or fissures arising from settlement or bad execution of the work. In flowing over the top of the dam (which it ought not, if the work is in a position to act), the water would flow down through this dry rubble to the very bottom, and, acting on any cavities, or porous or weak portions at that part of the embankment, would act with immense force—acting on the principle of a hydraulic ram. In the case before us you have it in evidence, that the water, before passing over the outer surface of the dam did pour down thus for half an hour, and also acting on the water which was forcing its way through leaks and a spring at the bottom, the dam boiled up in the centre, as the witness stated, and burst out from the bottom almost simultaneously with breaking away in masses from the top. It was thus the whole dam gave way, and the volume of water in the reservoir forth at once rushed.

Referring to the spring stated to have been discovered in the trench under the embankment, Captain Moody referred to the fact proved in evidence, that it was not led away by any of the usual and necessary modes, but

That very objectionable plans were resorted to in the hope of choking it up, or "weighting it down." But it was not by the weighted down;" it rose as the work rose, materially infusing the lower portion of the puddle, making it weak and bad, of a nature easily to be worked away with the water of the spring, as the latter forced itself through the centre of the embankment like a little rill of water issuing from the foot. At times this rill was clear, and at times muddy and yellow. The muddiness varied with the head of water in the reservoir. To the weak nature of the puddle at the base, and the washing away from time to time by the continuous run of water from the spring under the bottom of it, the great settlement of the puddle dam in the centre is to be attributed, a settlement which continued to go on during the construction, and after the dam had been raised to the height required in the specification. Of late years the settling down appears to have gradually ceased; doubtless the soft puddle had been nearly all squeezed out, and then would probably remain drowned, exerting little or no action, leaks increasing in size, and unequal settlements causing fractures.

Captain Moody concluded his observation with this emphatic warning to the inhabitants of Holmfirth

In this neighbourhood there are many mountain reservoirs receiving floods of water, impounded by lofty dams; they don't look upon them and treat them like mill-dams or fish-ponds. They are engines of mighty force, strong in aid of your industry to augment your wealth, and terrible in their power to destroy if mismanaged or neglected. The fact must be indelibly impressed on the minds of all the dwellers in Holmfirth.

At the conclusion of the gallant Captain's observations the audience broke out into a general buzz of approbation.

The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of the 14th ult. contained a series of Engravings from sketches made upon the spot, within a few hours after the disaster. We this week present our readers with other Illustrations, taken by one of our own Artists, from which a more accurate idea of the site of the reservoir and of the destructive ravages of the inundation may be gained.

The first Engraving is sketched from the heights above the Reservoir, showing the breach in the embankment or dam, and the waste pit tower rising above the level of the embankment.

The second large Sketch is taken from the bed of the Reservoir, looking towards the hilly range, crowned by Holme Moss, from which the Bilberry reservoir derived its supply of water, through the two dykes or becks shown in the Illustration.

The third large Sketch is a view of the village of Holmfirth from Victoria Bridge, and shows the awful débris occasioned by the inundation.

The fourth Illustration is taken from a point of the village known as "Mill Hill," upon which stands the White Hart hostelry, the host of which (Mr. W. Dyson), after narrowly escaping being drowned, exerted himself in a very extraordinary manner in the preservation of his neighbours.

The ruins of two large factories, known as the "Upper Mill" and the "Lower Mill," and a third vignette of "Charlesworth's Mill," also partially destroyed by the flood, complete the series.

COUNTRY NEWS.

DISCOVERY OF SILVER: LEAD MINES IN MONMOUTHSHIRE.—In the neighbourhood of Caerphilly, Monmouthshire, some very valuable mines of silver lead ores have just been discovered. The discovery was made by a charcoal burner, who, on leveling the ground for the purpose of raising a hut, had occasion to remove a small tree, and whilst doing so found a large mass of the ore in close proximity to the surface. This was upwards of ten tons in weight, and since then the company who are working the mine have found much larger quantities. A pit and levels are being sunk and driven for the purpose of working the ore. Upwards of 100 tons of lead ore have been raised in a few weeks from a shaft sunk in a meadow, and this ore having been analysed, yields 6 oz. of silver and 10 cwt. of good lead to the ton. The mineral field of South Wales has also in this neighboorhood yielded other treasures, for several rich seams of bituminous coal and iron ore have been found, and amongst these is a fine rich vein of the red ore upwards of six feet in thickness. There can be no doubt that these discoveries will prove very productive.

SERIOUS CHARGE AGAINST THE LIVERPOOL POLICE.—The Liverpool magistrates were occupied on Saturday in investigating serious charges against Mr. Dowling, commissioner of the Liverpool police force, and Sergeant Tomlinson, arising out of a wanton attack committed on the previous Monday night upon a person who had been guilty of no offence, as delivered by the Rev. Dr. Cahill, at Hoy-cross Chapel. The charges were, that the head-constable and his superintendent had endeavoured to suppress the truth of the matter from the stipendiary magistrate, Mr Mansfield, which purpose they had effected or permitted Sergeant Tomlinson to make a second report of the transaction, and had erased the leaves of the charge book, so as to destroy a former report, in which the conduct of the police was seriously implicated as having attacked the peaceable. The head constable or excuse. On Friday week, after long and patient investigation before Mr. Mansfield, assisted by James Aiken, jun., Esq., two of the police officers, with Sergeant Tomlinson, were immediately suspended; and on Saturday the magistrates suspended the head-constable and the superintendent. It is not a fortnight since the Liverpool town council signified its readiness to grant Mr. Dowling a retiring pension of £300 a year. The town Council have agreed, notwithstanding the above affair, to grant Mr. Dowling, whose resignation they accepted, a retiring allowance of £300 per annum, in consideration of his previous services. He has been head-constable for upwards of 20 years. It is alleged that he acted under the influence of opinion which he had recently taken as medicine, to cure a painful disease under which he laboured. It is said that he will be indicted at the instance of the magistrates for conspiracy.

INCENDIARY FIRE.—On Saturday night, the homestead of Mr. G. Rampley, at Brampton Lodge, near Huntingdon, with the buildings in the farm-yard, were destroyed by fire, occasioned, it was supposed, by an incendiary. 2 fine cows, 8 heifers, 9 weaned calves, 22 pigs, and about 30 sheep were burned to death, and 26 so much injured as to be obliged to be killed on the following morning. Almost the whole of the agricultural implements were destroyed. About 40 quarters of wheat and 30 quarters of beans, which were in the barns, were insured in the Alliance Office, and the farming stock in the Suffolk.

On Saturday last, Mr. Berkeley Bloxsome, brewer, of Cheltenham, was returning home from shooting, and on passing through the rear of his premises he stopped, as it is supposed, to draw the charge of his gun. While in the act the piece exploded, and the contents lodged in Mr Bloxsome's heart, causing instantaneous death.

On Saturday morning last, Mr. Spencer Suthers, a highly respectable cotton spinner and manufacturer, at Oldham, near Manchester, committed suicide by jumping down one of the coal-mines of Messrs. Evans, Barker, and Co., Oldham, the depth of which is 438 feet. He left his legs was snapped off, flew to a distance of several yards. The right leg was also broken. The unfortunate gentleman was of course quite dead when it fell up. He was about sixty years of age, and in good circumstances. It appears that he had previously suffered acute pain from rheumatism, and had been in a low desponding state of mind for some days. He has left a widow, son, and two daughters to mourn the sad event.

On Wednesday afternoon, as the one o'clock train was coming down the incline from the Camden station, North-Western Railway, without an engine as usual, the spring of the break gave way; and there being no means of arresting the progress of the train, it ran into the station at the rate of twenty miles an hour, knocked against the platform, and rebounded with great force. The shock was very great, and caused several severe bruises to the passengers. Among them was the Hon. Mr. Cavendish, whose face was much cut and bruised.

The port of Folkestone is to be raised to the fourth class. The imports have of late so considerably increased, that the Custom-house is now being made one-third larger, to afford accommodation.

MUSIC.

THE 137TH ANNIVERSARY FESTIVAL OF ANCIENT BRITONS.

The annual gathering on St. David's Day of the "Most Honourable and Loyal Society of Ancient Britons," in Freemasons' Hall, is signalised by a musical celebration perhaps the most remarkable of the sort by the celebration of that interesting and valuable institution, "The Welsh Charity School," of Gray's-inn-road, is one of the most captivating items. At Monday's anniversary Col. the Hon. E. G. Douglas Pennant, M.P., was in the chair; and nearly 200 persons sat down to the banquet, the ladies gracing the gallery and raised platforms at the end of the hall. Welsh harpers no longer welcomed the visitors, but a small brass band occupied the upper gallery, over the president's chair; and the stewards of the day wore their plumed cocked-hats, almost every one in the room having the distinctive look at the button-hole of the coat.

In the morning the Bishop of Manchester preached the customary sermon at St. George's, Hanover-square, and eloquently advocated the cause of the charity at the dinner in the evening. Colonel Wood and Colonel the Hon. G. Rice Trevor, M.P., equally enforced the charitable objects of the society, and nearly £1000 in donations was announced as the result of the day's appeal—her Majesty subscribing 100 guineas, and the Earl of Powis (who was present), Lord Dynevor, the Marquis of Anglesey, Sir Charles Morgan, the Bishops of Bangor, St. Asaph, St. David's, Llandaff, and Manchester; the Hon. Colonel Pennant, Colonel Wood, Hon. Rice Trevor, Hon. R. Clive, M.P., &c., being liberal contributors. The society supports 200 children, of whom 196 were present, the picture of health and happiness; the annual cost of each child being only £9 for food, clothing, and education. The expenditure for 1851 amounted to £2700, being £150 lower than that of 1850, and £300 below that of 1849.

The musical arrangements of the present festival were under the direction of Mr. Brinley Richards, the pianist and co-composer, who is a native of the Principality, and who gave his gratuitous services. He performed his admirable arrangement, "Recollections of Wales," comprising the melodies "Of noble race was Shenkin," "Lady Owen's delight," and the "Rainy of the Lark," in excellent style. Mr. Streather executed a harp fantasia on Welsh themes with considerable skill. The glee "Rondo" by Sir H. R. Bishop "Bid me discourse," and, with Miss Pyne, gave Mr. Charles Glover's pretty duet, "From our merry Swiss home;" Mr. Henson sang "Annie Laurie;" Mr. Swift, "All is lost now," from Bellini's "Sonnambula" (unbounded); Mr. Ransford, "St. David's-day;" and Miss Ransford, Messrs. Swift and Ransford, Mr. Brinley Richards's trio, "Up, quit thy bower." Festa's madrigal, "Down in a flowery vale;" "Rule Britannia," and the National Anthem, were included in the programme; but the most interesting piece of the night was the ode, sung by a portion of the children after they had passed round the hall, to the high gratification of the guests. The words of the ode are by Miss Florence Wilson, and Mr. Brinley Richards has adapted them to the ancient Welsh melody, "Llwyn Onn." The wish expressed in the ode, that the Prince of Wales may be seen in the chair, was loud y cheered. The children sang in unison; but the exquisitely pure-toned voices of the young performers in its sympathetic effect, and the ode was rapturously encored. To listen to these Britonic vocalists would alone suffice to render this Welsh festival attractive. During the evening, Talhiarn, the poet, improvised in English and Welsh with his usual facility.

THE ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION.

Under her Majesty's most gracious patronage, a second series of four evening concerts commenced, at Willis's Rooms, last Monday, Mrs. Anderson, Mrs. M. Williams, Messrs. Lockey, Francis, Hobbs, Land, and Phillips being the vocalists. The programme comprised Calcott's "Oh, snatch me away!" Bayly's "When shall we three meet" (in which Mr. Francis singularly failed), Battishill's "Amidst the myrtles," Webbe's "Swiftly from the mountain's brow," Spofforth's "Come, bounteous May," Sir H. R. Bishop's "Sleep, gentle lady," Kuyvett's harmonised "Rose of the valley," and Dowland's madrigal, "The Pedlar." Between the two parts allotted to the glees there was a selection from the music of Purcell and Arne, from the "Tempest." It is an excellent reason to hope that a hundred more such pieces, as a concluding performance of short duration the speciality can be adhered to; but in an evening concert of larger proportions the selection requires relief between the glees and madrigals. The fashion of the "Union" is spreading in the highest circles, and deservedly so, for more finished part-singing has never been heard in this or any other country.

MUSICAL EVENTS.

Mr. W. T. Best gave his third and last performance of organ music on Mr. Willis's large organ for Hampstead Church, on Tuesday: the selection included Handel's first concert, and prelude and fugue in F minor, J. S. Bach's toccata and fugue in D minor, Mendelssohn's Concertstück, Kollis's barcarole, a fugue by J. L. Krebs, a trio in G major by G. A. Homilius, and an andante in F with variations of his own composition.

Mr. G. Perren had a concert at the Sussex Hall, in the City, on Wednesday night, with the co-operation of the Misses Heald, F. Jacobs, Kansford, Mrs. J. Rose, Mrs. R. Limpus, Messrs. Genge, Holmes, R. Limpus, Ransford, F. Smith, Bodda, W. Rose (pianist), Case, and Herr Jonghmans.

The first of the Union Musicale Wednesday concerts took place on the 3d instant, at St. Martin's Hall: the vocalists were the veteran Braham, Messrs. Swift, Brandt, G. Tedder, Wallworth, Onorati, Misses Messent, Alleyne, Lowe, R. Braham, Shubach, Wells, and Brougham; the solo players were Miss A. Goddard, H. Baller, Herr Lutgen, and M. Sonalle. Herr Auschuez was the conductor.

Mr. Lindsay Sloper had his third soiree of pianoforte music, at the Prince Arthur-street Rooms, aided by Miss Dolby, Mr. Benson, Mr. Osborne, and Mr. Lucas. Mr. Sloper is entitled to great praise for first introducing to the musical public in this country the compositions of Dr. Schumann, the husband of Madame Clara Schumann (Clara Wieck), whose name enjoys a high reputation in Germany; he has composed symphonies, quartetts, trios, and an opera. As usual with a new name, "doctors differ" here as to his merits, but he is quite old to a fair hearing.

The Cecilian Society performed on Thursday, at the Albion Hall, Mendelssohn's "Elijah," conducted by Mr. Shoubridge; with Mr. Boardman as organist.

Mr. Adams, the celebrated organist, performed on Thursday on a new organ, but by Gray and Davison, of the New-road, for the parish church, Bolton, Lancashire. The instrument is on the German plan, and has three manuals and pedal organ. Being Mr. Adam's farewell public performance, much interest existed: he played Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture, Handel's "Occasions," and "Esther" overtures, the adagio and allegro from Mozart's symphony in D, a romance from Haydn's symphony, "Le Reine de Fayes," introducing the Kemphyon pipe, besides four pieces extempore; the concluding one containing the theme of the National Anthem.

The Sacred Harmonic Society repeated last night, at Exeter Hall, under Costa's direction, Handel's "Samson:" Mrs. Anderson, Miss Dolby, Messrs. Sims Reeves, T. Williams, Weiss, and Phillips, being the chief singers.

Mr. Willy, the violinist, and Mr. John Willy, the pianist, have been performing with great success in the provinces.

Herr Pauer and Herr Molique performed at the second soirée of the Musical Institute, in Sackville-street, last Saturday; and the Rev. Mr. Rowden, M.A., read a paper on "the Influence of Keys in Music."

Mr. Hausmann, the violoncellist, assisted by Miss Rainforth, the Misses Smith, Messrs. Mackenzie, Stewart, and Durmer, gave a morning concert in the Hopetoun Rooms, Edinburgh, last Saturday, to a very numerous auditory. Mr. Hausmann being popular in Scotland.

Balfe's new opera, in four acts, the libretto by M. de St. Georges and Mr. Bunn, will be produced at Drury Lane Theatre, to-night (Saturday), under the composer's own direction, supported by Miss Crelinton, Miss P. Horton, Miss L. Pearson, Mr. Tennant, Mr. Weiss, Mr. Walworth, and Mr. Borrani. Mr. Sims Reeves. The theatre was closed last night for the rehearsal of the new work.

A two-act comic opera, by Signor Biletta, composer of the ballet music for the Royal Italian Opera, Covent-garden, in 1847, will be produced at the Haymarket Theatre next Monday, supported by Miss Louisa Pyne, Mr. Harrison, Mr. Corri, and Mr. Weiss.

The Royal Society of Musicians will celebrate its 114th anniversary festival, at Freemasons' Hall, next Tuesday; Sir George Clerk, M.P., in the chair. An attractive musical entertainment will be provided, as usual.

On Monday the Musical Society will give the fifth of their concert; the English Glee and Madrigal Union will have a meeting, and Mr. Kiall mark will commence his pianoforte soirees. On Tuesday, the Hungarian Orchestra will appear at the St. James's Theatre, under Herr Kalozdy's direction. On the same evening Mr Daniel Gear and Mr. Lucas will give their soirées. On Wednesday will be the fifth of the City Wednesday Concerts, and the first of Mr. Lucas's Musical Evenings. On Thursday will be the fourth of Mr. Ella's Musical Winter Evenings, at Willis's Rooms. Halle, Piatti, and Molique will perform.

Mr. John Parry having called in his "Notes, Vocal and Instrumental," intends shortly to give the public a re-issue, consisting of scraps and sketches, musical, poetical, and critical, under the title of "Mr. John Parry's Portfolio for Children of all Ages."

Mr. E. Laurent's prize of ten guineas for the best original waltz will be contended for on Monday next, at the Argyll Rooms.

M. Berlioz, the celebrated composer, has arrived in town from Paris, to conduct the approaching concerts of the New Philharmonic Society at Exeter Hall. A portion of his "Romeo and Juliet" choral symphony will be performed at the first "New Philharmonic" concert, on Monday next. Amongst the other novelties during the series will be Mr. Edward Loder's dramatic cantata, "The Island of Calypso" Mr. Macfarren's cantata, "Leonora," and pianoforte concertos by Sirs and Dr. Wylde, with gleanings from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Tauris" and "Armide;" Spontini's "Vestale;" Beethoven's much choral symphony and triple concerto for violin, piano, and violoncello; and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" will also be executed on the grandest scale. The orchestra will include upwards of 100 players, besides a chorus of 200 voices.

The Philharmonic Society will commence their annual series of entertainments at the Hanover-square Rooms next Monday week, under the direction of Mr. Costa.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

The widow of Weber died recently in Dresden. Mdlle. Aneri, the contralto, has made a highly successful début in Paris, as Isabella in Rossini's "Italiana in Algeri;" Calzolari, Ferranti, and Belletti sustained the other parts. The Queen of England has presented to Meyerbeer two works of art, accompanied with a most flattering letter, thanking the illustrious composer for his dedication of his ode to the memory of Rauch, the celebrated sculptor.

Mdme. Sontag, Miss Catherine Hayes, and Signor Charlestan at the last advices Signora Bosacchi and sailed for California on the 11th ult.: Mr. Augustus Braham, the tenor, did not accompany her, but remains at New York, to sing in opera. Mr. Wallace, the pianist and composer, is making a tour through the South and West. Ole Bull was at Washington. Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable" had been successfully produced at the Astor-place Italian Opera-house, New York, with Mdle. Steffanoni as Alice; Mdme. Bertucca-Maretzek as the Princess; Salvi, Robert; and Marini, Bertram.

THE THEATRES.

SURREY.

"The Barrister; or, Moral Courage," is the name of a new piece produced on Monday, evidently founded on the basis of the French story which has already been often dramatised, in which the husband orates his wife and seducing friend out of an adulterous intention. The story is here made entirely English in its incidents and characters—the scene being a villa at Norwood. The eloquent spouse is named Mr Poynter, a barrister of such forensic address that the culprit lover had no chance whatever against "the valour of his tongue." The drama is not altogether without merit, and Mr. Creswick was an efficient representative of the leading character. A second new piece was produced on the same evening, in which Mr. Shepherd enacts the Chevalier de Grenaillac. It is named "The Marason of Horrors," and is taken from Mr. Charles Sneb "La Barbe Bleue." The terrible female so named was gracefully impersonated by Miss Clarissa Doria.

ASTLEY'S.

A new drama has, at length, been produced at this theatre. It is entitled "Tancred, or the triumph of the Crusaders," and is well enough adapted to display the equestrian and spectacular resources at Mr. Batty's command. It has been compiled by Mr. John Sanderson, for the purpose of (we copy the play-bill) "introducing gorgeous scenery, banners, trophies, dresses, magnificent processions, suits of armour, innumerable auxiliaries, and the whole of the splendid stud of highly-trained steeds;" and this promise it amply accomplishes. The gist of the interest lies in the rival loves of Armida (Miss Maclean), a Mahomedan spy, and Clorinda (Miss Fenton), an Amazon for the leader of the Crusade, Tancred (Mr. Parsons). Armida falls into many perils, and is the occasion of many combats, but is saved from the rack by the intervention of a humble retainer. The Christians triumph, and the concluding tableau is remarkable for splendour.

OLYMPIC.

A new piece from the French, entitled "The Advocate and his Daughter," has met with success at this theatre. The original, entitled "Clémence; ou, La Fille de l'Avocat," was performed by a company of French comedians on the same spot some twelve years ago. The advocate, Rambert (Mr. Farren), proves himself equal to a moral crisis. He pleads against the validity of the marriage of his own daughter with the son of a banker. He gains the suit. A scene of strong feeling then ensues. The stern, proud Baron (Mr. Diddear), touched with the misery of all parties, relents, and a re-marriage is resolved upon with the consent of all parties. The part is one well adapted to Mr. Farren's aptitude. Miss Lyons, as Clémence, showed much susceptibility for passionate situations, though not quite equal to the impersonation and conception of the coarse character.

MARIONETTE THEATRE.

The puppets are getting ultra-pontical. "Poll Practice" is the name of the last production, exposing the corruption of electioneering, and urging parliamentary reform. Mr. Hugo Vezin, the author of the celebrated essay, however, grow too bold, and should, we think, have the fear of the Chamberlain impressed upon his wooden imagination, if penetrable by any influence so thoroughly ideal.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—It is reported that this ancient lyric establishment will be re-opened on the 23d inst., with Herr Hiller as the musical director and conductor, and Herr Eckert as accompanyist. The celebrated Mdlle Wagner, from Berlin, is engaged, and is to appear as Fidès in Meyerbeer's "Prophète." Madame Sontag will sing in the course of the season: Mdlle. Lagrua, Mdlle. Bertucca, Mdlle. Piccolomini, Signor Lablache, Signor Calzolari, Signor De Bassini, the famed barytone; Signor Belletti, Signor Ferlotti, the two Lablaches, &c., are also engaged.

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—This establishment will commence its season with Donizetti's "Martyrs," in the course of the month. Mr. Costa is director of the music, composer, and conductor. Grisi, Castellan, Mdlle. Bertrandi, and Viardot, Mario, Mei, Tamberlik, Ronconi, Tagliafico, Polonini, and Herr Formes are engaged. Amongst the works to be produced are Weber's "Faust" or "Euryanthe," Rossini's "Count Ory," and Alary's new opera "Sardanapalo," just executed with such success in St. Petersburg, with Grisi Ronconi, and Mario. It is also announced that a new opera by Jouisse, the chief characters to be sustained by Mdlle. Zerr, Tamberlik, and Herr Formes—will be one of the novelties of the season. Mdme Castellan has arrived in town, and the other principal artists are daily expected from St. Petersburg.

"INGOMAR."—This fascinating play continues its career of popularity. On Monday week it was performed with great applause at the Theatre Royal, Dublin. Mr. T. G. Kirby sustained the character of the barbarian hero, and Mrs. H. Kirby attempted the Greek maiden with some success. The play has also, we learn, to receive illustration, next Wednesday, at the Woolwich Theatre, from the talents and graces of Miss Kerry Bolty and Miss Addy Herand, whose Parthenia is expected to be a highly pleasing interpretation of the interesting heroine.

WILD-FOWL SHOOTING ON THE SOUTH COAST OF DEVONSHIRE.—In the account given with this Illustration, at page 173 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of last week, for Shapton Lea, read Slapton Lea; and for HART Bay, read Start Bay. For the privilege of a day's wild-fowl shooting once a year upon the Lea, the public are indebted to the liberal ty of Sir Robert Newman, Bart., who has a residence and some property close to the Lea.

A SCIENTIFICATION CONGRESS WITH A NATURAL HISTORY.—The remains of some flying reptiles, one of them supposed to have measured more than sixteen feet from tip to tip of its outstretched wings, have been found in the wit is chalk of Kent. Were these, supposed the poet, imagination, blown out to sea and drowned, so that their bones sank to the bottom and were preserved in the white mud? If not, whence came they?—Kidd's London Journal, an entertaining and suggestive miscellany.

THE MINT.—The return to the House of Commons, on the motion of Mr. Hume, of the changes in the Royal Mint and its present state, has been printed. It states that Sir J. Herschel succeeded Mr. Shell at a salary reduced from £2000 to £1500, and that the office is not in Parliamentary connexion with Government. Sir J. Herschel entirely agreed with the report of Mr. Shell for the reform of the Mint, which was approved of by the Lords of the Treasury. Many changes have, however, been since taken to accomplish the reform. The Mint board was dissolved in March, and the contracts with the melter and refiner terminated on the 30th of April. The peculiar distinction between the melter and the refiner is considered to be abolished. All persons employed in the Mint will perform their duties under the orders of the Master. All fees will henceforth be paid to the public account. Before the contract with the moneyers ceased, and before any new offered for the coinage of work, but only after there had been received, not one of which was accepted. In consequence a plan was prepared for the execution of the coinage under the employment of Government. This plan came into operation on the 2d of August, 1851. One resident engraver has since been retained, on good salary, to get up all private work. The best artists and modellers are retained as engravers without salaries, but paid for any work they may execute on a fixed scale. All private work in the Mint terminated with the Punjaub medals and those ordered under contract for the Commissioners of the Exhibition. The moneyers have received compensation in sums varying from £1000 to £500 per annum, according to length of service; the apprentices an annuity of £100. The melter and refiner (Mr. Mathison) has been allowed £,200 per annum. The annual saving is estimated at £11,000 per annum, subject at present to deductions for the various compensations allowed. The whole expense of the new establishment is estimated at £15,752 3s. per annum.

NEW MODE OF DETERMINING THE LONGITUDE.—A new method of determining longitude at sea, by means of a peculiar ship-chronometer, has been discovered by Rev. Tyler Thacher, on his late passage to San Francisco. This method of determining longitude by a single observation of any heaven y body, seen by night or day, either on meridian, or at any angle with the meridian, is perfectly economical, and as accurate and certain in its results as any case whatever in spherical trigonometry. He employs the same observations as to its latitude. The method by which this is done is partly geometrical and partly mechanical, but is plain and easy. The certificate from the master and the first mate of the ship Capitol show the discovery was made and tested by Mr. Thacher during the late voyage to that State. Mr Thacher is now in London, and proposes to secure a world-wide claim his discovery, so important to mariners and to the whole commercial world.

FREE TRADE.—The Liverpool Times states the following facts:—The number of vessels that entered that port in 1844 (the highest year) before the repeal of the Corn-laws, was 7,239, with a tonnage of 1,904,000 tons; in the year 1851 it amounted to 8,237,666, showing an increase of upwards of 1,100,000 tons in eight years. During the preceding eight years the increase of the tonnage of the port, though large, was not nearly so large. It was from 1 947,615 to 2,445,278 tons, giving an increase of 491,553 tons, or less by one half. During the eight years preceding that the increase was only one-third, from 1,3.1,111 to 768,429 tons, and, going back to the times before Mr. Huskisson removed any of the restrictions of the old Navigation Laws, the greatest increase on shipping ever recorded in eight years was from 709,849 tons to 893,929 tons—an increase of 183,093 tons, or not more than the sixth part of the increase of the last eight years.

ELECTION INTELLIGENCE.

THE NEW CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, AND THE ELECTORS OF BUCKS.

Mr. Disraeli has issued an address to his late constituents, again asking their votes in his favour on the 12th inst., the day fixed for the county election. The right hon. gentleman says:—

The late Administration fell to pieces from internal dissension, and not from the assault of their opponents; and notwithstanding the obvious difficulties of our position, we have felt that to shrink from encountering them would be to leave the country without a Government, and her Majesty without servants. Our first duty will be to provide for the ordinary and current exigences of the public service; but, at no distant period, we hope, with the concurrence of the country, to establish a policy in conformity with the principles which in opposition we have felt it our duty to maintain. We shall endeavour to terminate that strife of classes, which, of late years, has exercised so pernicious an influence over the welfare of this kingdom; to accomplish those remedial measures which great productive interests, suffering from unequal taxation, have a right to demand from a just Government; to cultivate friendly relations with all foreign powers and secure honourable peace; to uphold in their spirit, as well as in their form, our political institutions; and to increase the efficiency, as well as maintain the rights, of our national and Protestant Church. An Administration formed with these objects, and favourable to progressive improvement in every department of the State, is one which, we hope, may obtain the support and command the confidence of the community, whose sympathies are the best foundation for a strong Administration, while they are the best security for a mild Government.

I have the honour to be, gentlemen, your obliged and faithful servant,

London, March 1, 1852. B. Disraeli.

The vacancies in the Parliamentary representation of the country created by the new Ministerial appointments are not likely to lead to a loss of seat of the candidates for re-election. Lord Naas, however, the new Secretary for Ireland, is threatened with a strong opposition in the county of Kildare by Mr. Cogan, who starts on the Liberal interest.

North Lincolnshire.—Mr. Christopher says in his address:—"I accept office under the Administration of the Earl of Derby, from a conviction of his sincere desire to reverse that financial and commercial policy which has proved so injurious to native industry and capital. It is on this ground that I confidently rely on your support." Again confirming on me the proud distinction of representing your interests in the House of Commons."

North Essex.—The election is fixed for Tuesday, the 9th inst. It is not expected that Mr. Barnston, the new Secretary at War, will meet with opposition.

Colchester.—A deputation having waited upon Lord Naas, Secretary for Wavelnoe Park, to solicit him to come forward, that gentleman, in the near prospect of re-election, declined. At the approaching general election Mr. W. Hawkins will come forward with Lord John Manners in the Conservative interest; and as Mr. Hardcastle is prepared vigorously to defend his seat, a sharp contest will be the result. On the present occasion, Mr. Wingrove Cooke, who contested the borough with the noble Lord two years ago, will again appear as a candidate on the Liberal interest.

Oxford (County).—Mr. Henley offers himself for re-election, of which there is not the slightest doubt. It is expected that the election will take place on the 10th inst. Colonel Norris has accepted a requisition from the freeholders of Oxfordshire, and will be a candidate at the next general election, on Protectionist principles.

The proximity, as is generally supposed, of a general election, has called forth addresses to several constituencies independently of those arising out of the change of Ministry.

Tower Hamlets.—Mr. William Coningham, of Brighton, has issued an address to the electors of the Tower Hamlets, soliciting their suffrages at the next election. He says he is an advocate for the ballot and the extension of the franchise, a financial reformer, and an unflinching supporter of the principle of free-trade. King, a "Conservative, protectionist, and a Protestant," and Mr. G. S. B. Hanbury, a Conservative Free-trader, however, by his promise to propose no protectionist measures, from whatever quarter introduced, which will afford relief to the farmer, as understood by retaining the promise of support from the "Ross Protection Society." Mr. C. Baird will again come forward as the Liberal and Free-trade interest. The hon. gentleman has just issued his address.

In his address he declares that, believing the agriculture interest to be the mainstay of the state, he will support all such measures as may be required to relieve it from unequal burdens.

The proprietors of an establishment which has not been closed are said to be in treaty with the Amalgamated Society for a number of men to enter their shop, and work by relays, so as to keep up operations night and day. The men seem, however, to be devising means for opening a tool-shop, and working relays for themselves, in order to provide tools for the contemplated co-operative establishments.

The stationary engine-drivers have had a meeting at Manchester, at which it was agreed to give 1s. per week to the men who are out of work The millwrights of Manchester have held another meeting, at which it was decided by a majority of seven to one to join the Amalgamated Society. This was one of the largest meetings of the trade ever held in Manchester. They have determined to send deputations to the millwrights in other towns, to induce them to act in a similar manner.

The nailers of Stourbridge resumed work on Tuesday, all the masters but two having agreed to continue the old prices. Not for twenty years have the operatives suffered so severe a rin a strike as during the last month, and it is hoped that the credit of the poor sufferers that they endured in peace, and their conduct has been uniform y good.

On Thursday evening a preliminary meeting of the trades of London was held in St. Martin's hall, Long-acre—J. Vansittart Neale, Esq., in the chair —at which resolutions were carried pledging the trades to support the engineers by means of such an organisation as "will ensure sufficient funds to conduct the present contest, and enable the workmen to establish themselves permanently as a association workshops."

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Orders have been issued by the Admiralty to fit the London, of 90 guns, Captain the Hon. M. Stopford, now lying at Sheerness, in a re-pects as sea-going ship. As soon as she is completed she will proceed to the Downs, to be there stationed as a guard-ship, unless required for more active service. Her duties there will be to enter volunteers out of the particular of general service.

Guernsey Command.—Lieutenant-General Bell, C.B., will, it is said, succeed Sir Colin Halkett to hold the Guernsey command after the 31st of March.

Captain the Hon. A. E. Hardinge, Coldstream Guards, has been appointed aide-de-camp to Viscount Hardinge, the Master-General.

It is stated that the office of Military Secretary has been offered to Viscount Sidmouth, one of the members for North Durham, and formerly an officer in the 1st Life Guards.

Royal Canadian Rifle Regiment.—We observe by the army estimates that it is proposed to reduce this regiment this year from 1000 to 600 rank and file.

Pensioners for Service in Canada.—A circular has recently been issued by the War-office, calling upon able-bodied pensioners, fit to carry arms, to volunteer to Canada, there to be formed into local companies.

Army in Ireland.—At present the force in Ireland is as follows:—Cavalry regiments, Dragoons, or Light Dragoons, 5; Lancers, 2; Hussars, 2; Artillery, Sappers and Miners, 1; Royal Engineers and Staff, 1; regiments of infantry and 16 depôts of infantry, or in all 32 regiments and depôts. Total, 19,851, exclusive of officers

Examination of Mates in the Royal Navy.—By a circular of the Lords of the Admiralty, No. 50, dated 1 March 10, 1843, it was provided that masters who had already passed abroad should be at liberty to undergo their first or second examination at any port or foreign station at which the Royal Naval College or, should they belong to a ship under orders to be paid off, the first or second day after being so paid off. But, in consequence of a knowledge of trigonometry and algebra having now become a requisite to pass so passing, their Lordships have been pleased to extend to them the benefit of sending the third examination day after their arrival in England; or, in the case of officers having been paid off in a ship, the benefit of a second exam nation day from the date of their having been so paid off. This rule is a so to apply to masters' assistants and second masters, and it is to be distinctly understood, should an officer neglect to pass on one of those examinations or days, or should he be rejected on any of them, he will forfeit all claims to his time as seniority dated from the day of his original passing.

Supply of Guns.—Army Estimates for the Cape of Good Hope.—An account of the number of guns and of pounds of gunpowder annually exported from the United Kingdom to the Cape of Good Hope, from the c ose of 1644 to 1852, inclusive, ordered by the House of Commons, to be printed 5 June 1851, and ordered by the House of Lords:—In the year ending 5th Jan, 1845, there were exported 2002 guns, 225,550 lb. gunpowder; 1846, 4097 guns, 85 023 lb gunpowder; 1847, 6972 guns, 125,915 lb. gunpowder; 1848, 4100 guns, 116,093 lb gunpowder; 1849, 3576 guns, 197,300 lb. gunpowder; 1850, 5431 guns, 169,755 lb. gunpowder; 1851, 6777 guns, 430,103 lb. gunpowder; 1852, 12,180 guns, 144,790 lb. gunpowder.

From the army estimates for the current year it appears that, for the recruiting service, to the 31st of March, 1853, the charge to be provided is £19,304 11s. 1d., of which £3.01 16s. is for the service in London.

Time Coast Telegraphs.—Orders have been issued for putting the telegraphs at the various coast-guard stations on the south coast of England in an efficient state, as well as those on the East and North coasts, and from the South Foreland to Sheerness, by which means communication can be made from any part of her Majesty's channel cruising in the Channel to any or all of the great naval arsenals, the ships in the rivers Thames and Medway being so stationed as to be the means of communicating with Chatham and Woolwich Dockyards, and from the latter place to head-quarters, Whitehall. It is now above twenty years since these telegraphs were used, and, consequently, they will in most cases have to be replaced with new ones The last time they were in operation was when Captain (now Admiral) Sir Hugh Pigot commanded the Talavera, Lieutenant Pigot, now Admiral, the first service vessel in that, being then fitted by private officers (Lieut-Gard).

On Wednesday the Field-commissioned officers of the Foot Guards and line regiments at present on the home garrison, having previously been supplied with a necessary cartouche-boxes and muskets from the pecial Reserve Depôt, marched to the Royal Arsenal, where they were supplied with Minié rifles, from which they afterwards fired several rounds at 200 yards range. The practice was excellent, every bal. striking the target, and many the bull's eye.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Of racing and steeple-chasing we have a very unpretending calendar for the week ending: Doncaster, hoc, however, although in its Springhood, presents a full-grown appearance, the list for the Spring Handicap (Wednesday and Thursday) holding out promise of large fields and an abundance of sport. The new Cesarewitch course, mentioned in last week's, makes their meeting sixth secundus. Coventry has one day of mixed sport on Tuesday, and Stockton two papers. Lady's Steeple-chasing at Moreton-in-the-Marsh, on Thursday, completes the programme for the week. The coursing fixtures embrace Holywell, Mallany (Scotland), and Spiddal (Ireland) on Wednesday; Ridgway (Lytham) on Thursday; and Belsay (Northumberland) on Friday.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Notwithstanding the news of a renewal of hostilities with the Burmese, the English Market opened at the closing prices of the preceding week, Consols quoting 97⅞ to ⅞ alternately advancing to 97⅝. After the hours of business some bargains were said to have been effected at 97⅝, an advance on Tuesday Consols opened at the improvement of 97⅛ ⅜, and closed at 97⅜ ⅝. The improvement of ¼ per cent occurred on Wednesday, the speculators buying upon the intended reduction of the rate of discount by the Bank of England. The latter event did not take place, but the reduction by the Bank of France of the interest from 4 to 3 per cent. was duly announced on Thursday. There was no speculation at the close of the week, the prospect of a discussion being a damper. GOLD MEDAL PRESENTED TO THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

AMONG the graceful acts of the President of the Royal Commission, in recognition of valuable services in the early stages of the Great Exhibition, we have great pleasure in recording the presentation, by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, of a Gold Medal to each of the Executive Committee. We engrave this handsome testimonial from the Medal received by Mr. Francis Fuller, one of the most active of the Committee. The presentation, it will be seen by the accompanying letter, was intended to have been made on the day of closing the Exhibition, but was unavoidably deferred until the present year.

Windsor Castle, October 15, 1851.

My dear Sir,—The Prince was anxious on this, the closing day of the Exhibition, to have presented you with a medal, in remembrance of the active part taken by you during the early discussions on the subject, and of your zealous exertions in the cause while success was yet doubtful; and he has commanded me to express his regret that the illness of Mr. Wyon, which has delayed the completion of the medal, obliges him to postpone doing so for the moment.

His Royal Highness, however, knowing that any delay should occur in assuring you of his sense of your services, and that even a particular desire having on the earlier stem of the Exhibition been so constantly in communication with you, that His Royal Highness should have directed me to convey this assurance to you.

Francis Fuller, Esq. Believe me, my dear Sir, yours very truly, C. GREY.

Mr. FRANCIS FULLER (whose Portrait appeared in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for October 18, last, and of whom we promised to give a Memoir in an ensuing Number) was born at Coulsdon, Surrey, educated at Isleworth, and on leaving school became a Land Surveyor, and afterwards followed his father's business as a surveyor and land agent. Mr. Fuller is the active member of the Committee of the Philanthropic Farm School, Redhill; of the School for the Indigent Blind, and several other charitable and reformatory institutions.

Mr Fuller became a member of the Society of Arts early in 1845, and commenced by obtaining a much-needed loan of £1000 to aid that society's funds.

Mr Whishaw having suggested a National Exhibition of Industry, on the 16th June a committee was appointed, of which Mr. Fuller formed one of the original members; and to this committee Mr. C. W. Dilke and Robert Stephenson were afterwards added.

In May, 1849, Mr Fuller, in pursuance of an arrangement with Messrs. Cole and Scott Russell, proceeded to Paris to inspect the Exhibition there, and returned on the 12th June to Southampton.

At the annual meeting of the Society of Arts, on the 16th, where Prince Albert presided, a letter from Mr. Fuller to Mr. Scott Russell was received, in which he said: "My journey to Paris results in an opinion that we can get up an infinitely better Exhibition than that. You may, therefore, say as much to our Royal President, when he is in the chair at the distribution of prizes, in order that the official announcement of our intentions may be made public." In consequence of this letter Mr. Russell spoke to the Prince, who announced publicly that an Exhibition was contemplated

On the 30th of June Mr. Fuller attended at Buckingham Palace, by special command, with Messrs. Thomas Cubitt, Henry Cole, and Scott Russell, when the plan of the Exhibition was settled.

Mr. Fuller's next important service was his inducing Messrs. Munday to undertake all the risk to the extent of £100,000, and to be content with such share of profits as an arbitrator might award. This is one of the most remarkable instances of liberality on the part of a contractor on record From this period until the issue of the Royal Commission, Mr. Fuller's exertions to promote the Great Exhibition were indefatigable.

On the 3d of September he attended at Balmoral with Mr. Cole and Digby Wyatt, to report progress. For the expenses incurred in these preliminary exertions, a sum of money was assigned to each of the gentlemen engaged. Mr. Fuller immediately placed the sum allotted to him (£300) at the disposal of the Society of Arts, to be applied in prizes

When the salaries of the Executive Committee were fixed at £300 a year each, Mr. Fuller's professional engagements preventing him from giving up his whole time, he declined to accept it.

Thus, it will be seen that, although Mr. Fuller took no active part in the labours of the Executive Committee after the completion of the Building, that he was, from his influence, business habits, liberality, and influence among capitalists, from 1845 until the success of the undertaking was assured, a warm and valuable supporter of the undertaking, to which he has contributed, besides his time, near £900.

ROEBUCK'S HISTORY OF THE WHIG MINISTRY OF 1830.*

"You are not for Reform," said Lord George Cavendish to Mr. Fox, when, in 1797, on Mr. Grey's motion for an improvement of our parliamentary representation, the great Whig had sat down, after delivering an insincere, make-believe, and shuffling speech, by which he sought to embarrass Pitt, not certainly to forward the cause he affected to support. "You are not for Reform."

"No, no: but we must do something," was Fox's reply. The whole spirit of Whiggery was in the remark. The Whigs never yet were sincerely "for" any great principle. They never yet were for anything truly and heartily, except the aristocratic Revolution families, and the holy alliance by which those families manage to reconcile as much as possible, keep office as long as possible, and enjoy office as exclusively as possible Place, every place, and nothing but place, has been the drift of all their professions, the inspiration of their patriotism, the scope of their enthusiasm, the beatific vision when on the left hand of the Speaker, the end of man when on his right hand. Are they in opposition, as Mr. Fox was in 1797, and do they adopt, as he did, some popular principle? It is a sham. Surely they are not "for" the question? "No, no; but they must do something."

And so they must "do something" when, though in power, they are falling from power. Do we not see it now?

If people wish to comprehend why it is that, about twenty years after the great measure of Parliamentary Reform was carried through Parliament, and passed into law, a new measure of Parliamentary Reform had become necessary; if they wish to listen with a thorough appreciation to the animadversions of the "Whig critic on the Whig bill," if they desire to gauge, according to its real worth, that famous Whig party which has so largely influenced the destinies of England for one hundred and sixty years; and if, more particularly, people care to understand what that party has now become, and in what degree the honest hopes of the nation have been, over and over again, excited by the promising demeanour, and dashed and duped by the mean performance of Whiggery itself, let them attentively read Mr. Roebuck's work.

It is hard for one who perfectly knows the Whigs, who is amply provided with evidence of their habitual, and we may say traditional, if not hereditary, manner of conducting their political business, to write their history with entire impartibility; it is hard to resist the temptation which continually presents itself in the path of the upright comentator on events—the temptation to indulge in language of natural contempt and denunciation. This temptation Mr. Roebuck has manfully withstood. His narrative is singularly calm; it is essentially fair, straightforward, and unbiassed.

If the true history of a party read like an impeachment—not on account of the form, but on account of the matter, not in consequence of the expressions used, but in consequence of the events narrated; not through the unfairness, but through the fairness of the writer—that is not the fault of him who tells the history, though it may be the disgrace of those whose history is told.

One praise, such as it is, must be conceded to the Whigs by whoever attentively studies the career of the party—the praise of not having been, strictly speaking, guided by bad principles. For the fact, correctly stated, is simply that they have been, for the most part, guided by none. The pelf and interest of an exclusive, arrogant, and often very able oligarchy have ever been the prevailing and predominant objects of Whig tactics, and the chief inspirers of Whig ambition.

But good acts may be performed, where the motives are not of corresponding excellence. No other view of the character of the party, as a party, would be consistent with the facts. Good measures, known to be such, have sometimes received a lukewarm, sometimes a zealous support from the Whigs. When no popularity was to be gained by advocating such measures, that was the season of lukewarmness. When reform measures had become popular, the Whigs had always reached enthusiasm. Reform has been thus treated by them; religious liberty, retrenchment of public expenses, reduction of taxation, Free Trade, the education of the people, the amendment of the laws, are questions all of which bear on their dealt with in a similar spirit. For the sake of power, for the prospect of power, they have held lightly things even dearer to them than such principles—the distinctness and independence of their own family federation. Of this Mr. Fox's conduct at the time of the coalition is but an instance; and the anxious intrigues by which the Whigs sought an alliance, in vain, with the Duke of Wellington's administration, is another instance.

It must, however, be admitted that the party has generally been ably led; and that an apparent reluctance to assume the Government, when they might possibly have obtained it by some more than usually odious dereliction of decency, and by taking their stand on ground abhorrent from the general feelings of the people, has, on several occasions, enhanced the credit and ultimate interests of the party. Thus, there is an air of magnanimity in the conduct they pursued in the affair of Queen Caroline. But in making head, in rearing an intrepid front against the King's pitiless treatment of his wife on that occasion, the Whigs damaged not, but greatly strengthened, their political position. They were in opposition. By adopting the policy of the Ministry in that wretched episode of the history of George IV., nothing could be gained. On the contrary, that which was gained by the opposite course would have been lost. What was the result? "The Queen, worn out with grief, and passion, and toil, sank and died. The people considered her a martyr, and her enemies malignant, cruel, and unscrupulous persecutors. The feeling towards the King was indignant hate." The Whigs were therefore very far from being injured by their virtue. Their magnanimity or ability had its reward. And when we remember that they really had no alternative, even in the most crafty point of view—when we bear in mind that, for all practical purposes of advantage, the Government whom they had opposed were in possession, and had, as it were, the copyright of all that meanness—we really cannot help smiling at Mr. Roebuck's eulogies on the "generosity" thus evinced by the Whigs. It is Mr. Roebuck who is generous. He extols men who, at best or worst, could only have been plagiarists of a most unpopular policy, for not having been its authors.

While this astuteness, this undeniable ability, has generally marked the tactics of the Whigs, and while they have undoubtedly possessed in their ranks some of the greatest orators, and even some of the best official administrators of the last century and a half, it is singular to what an extent their pre-eminent attention to party ends has deprived them of the leisure, the means, and the chance of displaying that better and more real understanding of the scope and mission of statesmanship, by which patriotic politicians would prefer to be distinguished. When Adam Smith, for instance, propounded his economic views, the leaders of the Whigs were the very last to give them the slightest attention. In this, Pitt, even Pitt, showed a spirit more awake to what was incumbent on a statesman, than did the leader of the party who more peculiarly professed to represent the growing intelligence of the age, and to embody the expanding knowledge of the country. Early in life Pitt had studied the arguments of Adam Smith, "had acknowledged their truth and appreciated their worth." "But, hurried away by the animosity of his party to the French Revolution and its great champion Napoleon, he had no time, no thought, for anything but war, and the subsidising Europe into resistance to France." On the other hand, Fox, at his entrance into public life, "was profoundly ignorant," as Mr. Roebuck remarks, "of every branch of political economy, and remained so to the end of his days."

We cannot accept, at least as Mr. Roebuck phrases it, his theory that a statesman should, above all things, take care not to be before his age. Certainly if he be before his age in the measures which he actually attempts to accomplish, he is likely to be of little use, for it is probable he will not accomplish anything. At all events, his usefulness will be of that kind which benefits his country rather than himself; which benefits his country, indeed, by the sacrifice of himself. He will be misunderstood out of doors, and thwarted in Parliament. His enemies will have every advantage over him; and the public, or rather the people, whom he endeavours to serve, will think they are but judging against him when they are prejudging. Doubtless it was with a reference to some such occurrences that the ingenious old fable was devised, to which Addison makes pleasing allusion. A certain rain fell, which had the quality of making all fools whom it touched; and the wise men, anxious to preserve their wisdom, hid themselves in caves, chuckling to think what a number of improvident people remained abroad. And the rain ceased, and the wise men came forth to find that the world, in which, however, they obtained less influence than before—the fools had grown so numerous Now, whether the disparity in wisdom between one man and the rest of the men of his time arise from his great advance, or, as in the fable, from their great retrogression, that which, in either case, is the natural result of the disparity would, it is obvious, equally follow.

But while we admit that a statesman who should attempt to introduce measures in their whole scope and bearing new to the ideas, strange to the prejudices, and in advance of the knowledge of the age, would fail, we deny that a statesman ought to fear to be in advance of his country and of the age in his own enlightenment. His superiority in this respect is a pure unmixed advantage, of which he could give to his country the benefit even in such measures and operations as are familiar to their habits of thought. If a man sees that a whole system is unsound, and, while knowing how to construct a better, knows also that he would not be suffered to make such an attempt, he is at least a fitter person to mitigate the bad working of that system, than he whose ignorance is blind to the evil, and who, of course, cannot understand how to remedy what, in his mind, does not even want a remedy. We have not time fully to discuss this interesting question; but our view will, we think, approve itself to the judgment of every thoughtful person. A distinction should be drawn between a statesman who endeavours to do things for which the age is not yet ripe, and a statesman who is himself before the age in his enlightenment, but is content to use his superiority for those ameliorations only for which they are practical, which are feasible in his day. Both statesmen are "before their age;" but the former alone incurs the danger of which Mr. Roebuck speaks.

The Whigs have never been before their age. The popular mind far outstrips them. But they stand banded in high places, with a distinct organisation; and when the ideas of the people are changed into the clamours of the people, the Whigs are ready for action in the national service. Out of power, their plan has been to show by argument how very little is done by Government. In power, they slow by example how very little is for Government to say do.

The history of the Whigs is not traced by Mr Roebuck in these volumes beyond the celebrated measure of 1832, nor before 1830. He has thus chosen the period which, of all modern periods, has been the most prosperous and glorious for the Whig party. For that boast is that Reform Bill which the country wishes now to see replaced by a more liberal law, and which Lord John Russell undertakes to remodel with his own hands. But the true history of that great measure of 1832, whatever honour it reflected upon Earl Grey, reflects but little on the general party to which Earl Grey belonged. Repeatedly the Whigs at critical times betrayed the cause of Parliamentary Reform. For fifty years they used it for the purpose of party conflict, without one sincere or generous effort to make it the basis of the national representation. Sometimes Reform was the word of menace and terror, by the utterance of which they extorted forbearance or favourable terms from their enemies in the House. Sometimes it was the spell by which they endeavoured to rally the people at large. But it was always with them a word spoken "from the teeth outwards."

On the 7th of May, 1783, the Whig Government of Lord Rockingham and Mr. Fox negatived Mr. Pitt's motion for Reform. On the same day in the next year a similar motion brought forward by the same statesman was again negatived by the same Whig party. In 1783 appeared the Duke of Richmond's famous letter to Colonel Sharman, arguing the desirableness of universal suffrage and of annual Parliaments. To this plan the Whigs never yielded any support or countenance. In the same year the Coalition Ministry fell, and Pitt came into power. Pitt, with all his enormous faults, was at least no Whig. Two years after his accession to office, he again proposed, being then at the very height of influence and ascendency, his plan for Parliamentary Reform. His motion was negatived: a fact which proves that he was capable of risking his official position for the sake of his political convictions. But those convictions soon underwent a remarkable change. The French Revolution supervened; and Pitt took alarm at every measure, at every proposal, which threatened to introduce a large democratic influence into the Constitution. So complete was the alteration thus wrought in his opinions, that we find him, in less than ten years, using all the power of the State and all the resources at his command to crush, by prosecutions for high treason, every attempt to procure what he had once loudly avowed and strenuously urged projects for Reform. It was then that occurred the celebrated trials of Horne Tooke, Hardy, and others.

About this time began to figure before the public that personage who ultimately carried Reform, when himself filling the high place of which Mr. Pitt then enjoyed the power to suppress, if possible, the very mention of the word. Earl Grey, of whom Mr. Smythe says, that he ought to have had graven on his tombstone the strange epitaph, "Here lies the man who never changed an opinion," wrote, as it were, the very sentence of the Parliamentary Reformers in the year 1793, proving, among other enormities of the system existing, that the Peers and the Treasury returned 116 members to the House of Commons, and money returned the rest.

In 1785, Mr. Grey's minority did not include a tithe of the Whig party. In 1797 the minority was larger; and yet the Whigs retired in a body from the House, and refused for two years to take any part in its proceedings. From 1797 to 1830, whoever studies the proceedings of the Whigs will perceive at once that in their moral state of the representation, because such an inquiry is calculated to throw a slur upon the representation of the country."

In 1830 he had lost this tenderness for the repute of the national representation; and endeavoured by elaborate satire and invective, in a speech on Sir Robert Peel, to show that the representation at that period was, and for some years previously had been, less pure than at any time in the history of Parliament. The fact is, that Lord John Russell never was cordially and genuinely a Reformer. Short of being a true Reformer, he has on several occasions gone great lengths to be thought one. He is a Whig, and the business and peculiar office of a Whig is to effect the delicate achievement of making the country regard you as a people's man, while you faithfully and scrupulously remain an inflexible oligarch. What Mr. Darach talks of religion, a real the practice of the Revolution families and of their confederates in politics.

We quote from Mr. Roebuck a passage which commences with a report of a portion of what Lord John said on the occasion to which we have referred:—

"I come now," he said, "to the resolutions which I shall have the honour to propose. The two first declare, that when a borough is convicted of gross and notorious bribery and corruption, it shall cease to send members to Parliament, and that a great town or county shall enjoy the right that is thus forfeited. On these heads I have nothing to add. The third declares, 'that it is the duty of this House to consider of further means to detect and prevent corruption in the election of members of Parliament.' . . . The last resolution declares the opinion of the House, that the borough of Grampound ought to be disfranchised.'* The terms of these resolutions prove that the noble Lord, at the time, was not aware of the real nature of the difficulties which lay in the path of every Reformer. He evidently did not understand the jealousies by which the subject was surrounded. But of the fears which beset the Whig party upon this matter, and upon this occasion, the words of Mr. Tierney gave scrupulous evidence. The report says that "Mr. Tierney declared that he never rose"—(and he rose after Lord Castlereagh)—"with more of the spirit of moderation, or with more of a disposition to harmony, than he felt at that moment; and, in the first place, he must thank his noble friend for the opportunity which he had afforded the House of unanimously and decidedly discountenancing the wild and visionary doctrines of reform which had lately agitated the country." A talk was then indulged in about some unfortunate boroughs which were said to be corrupt—meaning thereby, that the voters in them sold their votes for small sums of money the great borough proprietors sold his commanding interest for a large sum, not being accused of corruption, or threatened with disfranchisement. Lord John Russell withdrew his motion, and there was a general Whig gratulation, that the dangerous question was so quietly disposed of.

And in this there was nothing to be wondered at. All the great Whig families had almost entirely seceded from the ranks of the Reformers†, and they looked with great jealousy and suspicion upon all who based their pretensions to popular favour upon views of parliamentary reform. In the year 1819, the famous contest occurred for the representation of Westminster, between Mr. (now Sir John) Hobhouse, in the Radical interest, and Mr. George Lamb, representing the Whig party. The Tory party looked on, and enjoyed the scene; and the bitter invectives of Mr. Hobhouse against the Whigs, as pretended reformers, were evidently exceeding pleasing to those who hated reformers in every shape, whether they appeared as advocates of sweeping alterations, or friends of the little piecemeal changes by which the Whig party sought to maintain themselves in popular estimation as sincere and really extensive reformers‡.

The division between Reformers and Whigs grew every day more marked; the treachery of Whiggery as the law and the prophets.

We are forbidden by our restricted limits to pursue the reflections which the perusal of this remarkable book has suggested. We would beg our readers to read the work for themselves. Much information, which to them may not be new, is necessary to many in the daily life. In the 18th, however, his doubts were dispelled—he now entertained, he declared, "a confident expectation of being able to carry it unimpaired and immediately." He refused to see any reason for now retaining the bill in part, but it would appear that he was by no means sure of carrying the bill, even though he had the King's promise to make peers, and would not even say that he was a Minister until he was certain of the accession of the opposition: that accession was brought about in an extraordinary manner, and the Ministers became acquainted with the determination of the Peers on the 18th of May.

When Lord Grey was reinstated in office, together with the Chancellor had an audience of the King who received them with evident emotion, being annoyed and angry, as well as alarmed, and his pride being hurt, by his defeat and humiliation. [illegible] minutes were then taken by Lord Grey, and the two peers, contrary to custom, [illegible] during the whole of it; Sir Herbert Taylor, the King's private secretary, being also present. Both Lord Grey and the Chancellor firmly declined to return to office, unless a promise was given to them that he would create as many peers as might be necessary to secure a majority in the House of Lords. The King was now helpless and obliged to yield, he did so with unmistakable reluctance, however. So soon as the promise was given, the Chancellor, by way of precaution, begged to have it in writing; which request was also acceded to, and the paper, containing the written promise of the King, was given to the Chancellor.

Doubtless, to this and similar most curious passages in his work, Mr. Roebuck makes allusion, in a vindicatory postscript added to his preface at the last moment.

LOUIS NAPOLEON BONAPARTE: HIS LIFE AND WORKS.§

This is a remarkable publication, and one of considerable historical interest. Those who wish to investigate the political antecedents of the present military Dictator of France, and to study his political professions, with the object of reconciling with any show of consistency the various acts of his extraordinary career, will find in these volumes the materials. Upon examining them, he will find many preconceived notions, we had almost said prejudices, in regard to the character and conduct of the Prince President of the French, disproved by internal evidence of the most convincing kind He will find, that, instead of being the child of impulse, the reckless adventurer, the plaything of accident, which he has been considered by many, he has from the beginning been a free agent, acting upon long-drawn calculations of existing chances and probable results; that he has all his life been a conspirator against the Government of France, and unturningly at work to prepare the world for a change which he saw in the horizon, and deemed to be inevitable. The stupid expeditions of Strasburg and Boulogne set all ridicule upon laughing; and these feats have discouraged a less ardent and enduring temperament; but whilst Europe laughed, and the Orleans family relapsed into security, the traitor was still at work calculating the effect of the past demonstration, and laying plans for future operations.

Though a whole generation has elapsed since the mushroom dynasty of which he was the representative, had been dashed to pieces and scattered to the winds; though solemn treaties had declared every

* The resolutions are set forth in full at p. 1106, vol. xii, "Hansard's Debates." The words of the second resolution deserve remark: "The right of returning members . . . to be taken from any borough . . . should be given to some great towns, the population of which shall not be less than 15,000 souls, or to some of the largest counties."

† Any one who will give himself the trouble to look over, at the speeches of the several members of those powerful families, will find this assertion, to the very letter, accurate. The Cavendishes, with the Duke of Devonshire at their head—Lord Fitzwilliam, Lord Milton, Lord Carlisle, Lord Morpeth, Lord Holland, the Duke of Norfolk, together with the men of ability who formed their intellectual auxiliaries—such as Hardy, Sheridan, Tierney, Romilly, and others, never adopted reform as the chief topic of their discourse, or made it the chief object of their labours, except when driven by party necessities to employ what they considered a two-edged weapon. See "Authentic Narrative of the Events of the Westminster Election, 1819."

‡ The whole of this proceeding was so peculiar, that it deserves to be minutely described. The excitement, and anger, and hurt pride of the King who is himself now a Whig—viz. by Sir J. C. Hobhouse. After his long and unsuccessful struggle for Westminster with Mr. George Lamb, the Whig candidate, a very full and accurate history of the election was published by Sir Hobhouse's authority—a great portion of the narrative, indeed, was actually his own composition. This angry performance very curiously illustrates the various and varying views of the Reform question—by-gone views, now scarcely remembered, even by those of the Westminster Election, 1819."

Idée Napoléonienne as non avenir, Louis Napoleon could never forget that he was the son of an ex-King, the nephew of the Emperor, and never abandoned the pretensions which such a heritage might be supposed to give him. Public acts in which the name of Napoleon did not occur, he considered to be so much waste paper; the world, indeed, he would seem to consider never existed before the Empire, and had been in a state of trance ever since.

Touching the Strasburg affair, in a letter to Lieutenant Laity, when under trial for publications having reference to the event, he says:—

"I am asked, as already some of the newspapers begin to say, 'Where is the Party, I must ask?' Reply to this, "The party is nowhere, but the cause everywhere."

When defending himself before the Court of Peers for the Boulogne affair, he said:

At the same time do not allow yourselves to believe that, led away by the impulses of personal ambition, I have wished, by force of arms, to attempt in France a restoration of the Empire. I have been taught noble lessons, and have lived with rich or examples before me than to do so.

Jerusalem the son of a King, who descended without regret from a throne on the day when he had reason to believe that it was no longer possible to unite with the interests of France those of the people whom he had been called upon to govern. The Emperor, my uncle, profited by audacious enterprise, rather than accept by treaty the restricted frontiers, which could not but expose France to the insults and the menaces in which foreign nations to this day permit themselves to indulge. I have not lived a single day forgetful of such lessons. * * * I represent before you a principle, a cause, and a defeat—the principle is the sovereignty of the people, the cause is that of the empire, and the defeat is that of Waterloo.

In a curious letter, written from Ham soon after his incarceration to Lady Blessington, whose hospitality he had enjoyed in London, occurs a passage in which a frivolous past and a portentous future are strangely thrown in juxtaposition :—

My thoughts often go back to the spot in which you dwell, and, I recall, with happiness, the moments which I have passed in your amiable society, within that Count D'Orsay still holds a chasm with his spirited and open-hearted gaiety. Nevertheless, I have no desire to quit the spot in which I now am, for here I am in my proper place. With the name which I bear, I must be either in the ascendant or in the depths, and in brightness of power.

These were avowals, however, which he did not make everywhere and on all occasions. It behoved him, in order to conciliate public favour during a period when democratic principles were in the ascendant, to profess a political creed of extreme liberalism. Accordingly we find him in 1832 outbidding the Republicanism of 1830, in "Political Reveries," commencing thus:

The epoch in which we live is calculated alike to develop the faculties of mankind, and to encourage every feeling of self-respect. The liberty of the press and, ruling to every one its sovereignty of making known his opinions, we now write what formerly we should have had to comment ourselves with thinking, and the persuasion of the advent of a better future stimulates the faculties of all, however humble individually. One of the reasons which induce me to confide my sentiment to write is an ardent desire to ameliorate the condition of mankind; for, at present, if we cast a glance at the destinies of the various nations of the world, the spirit recoils with horror, and we feel impelled to raise a voice in defence of the rights of reason and humanity. For, indeed, what do we on all hands behold? The welfare of all sacrificed, not to the wants, but to the caprice of a few. Everywhere two parties are seen in face of one another—the one pressing forward towards the future, in the pursuit of the general good; the other clinging to the past, for the sake of maintaining the abuses which it has bequeathed. There we behold a despot, who rules by means of oppression; here, an elect of the people, who obtains his ends by means of corruption; there, an enslaved nation, who perish in the struggle for independence; here, a free people, who languish because they are being defrauded of the fruits of their victory.

These are followed by a form of constitution which differs very materially from that which, twenty years subsequently, he has imposed upon an enslaved nation. It is curious to examine some of the articles of this document, which has been so remarkably lost sight of in the more recent acts of its concoctor; who still, however, pretends to base his whole career upon a consistent appreciation of the Idée Napoléonienne: for instance, "The rights of all are equality, liberty, the security of person and property." "The right of expressing their thoughts by the press, or through the medium of the press, or in any other manner; as well as the rights of peaceably assembling, and of the free exercise of divine worship cannot be interdicted." "No one may be accused, arrested, or detained, except in the cases determined by the law, and according to the form prescribed by it." "The Legislative power is exercised collectively by the Emperor, the Senate, and the Chamber of Tribunes of the people. The right of proposing laws appertains severally to the Emperor, the Senate, and the Chamber of the Tribunes of the people. Nevertheless, every law of taxation must in the first instance be agreed to by the Chamber of the Tribunes of the people. Every law must be discussed and voted freely by the majority of the two Chambers severally. If a project of law has been rejected by one of the legislative powers, it cannot be brought forward again during the same session." "The Presidents of each Chamber is elected by itself at the commencement of each session." The responsibility of Ministers to the nation is established by the article which runs:—"The Chamber of the Tribunes of the People has the right to accuse the Ministers, and to bring them before the Senate, which alone has the authority to try them." The pretensions of the soldiery, whom the proclamations of December, 1852, declare to be the side of the people surrounded, are disposed of:—"The Legislative Body is essentially obedient; no portion of the army has the power of deliberation." Finally, in order to establish the liberty of the press upon the broadest basis, one of the "miscellaneous provisions" proposes that "the censorship or any preventive of publication be abolished."

Surely, after this, we may exclaim, as Talleyrand said, that language must be given to conceal one's thoughts; and many were, indeed, deceived, both at this period and throughout his subsequent progress to the Presidentship, by the "empty lying" of the representative of the Empire. Some there were, however, who had misgivings, and expressed them boldly; amongst them a woman, Madame Georges Sand, who, after reading the various political works of the prisoner of Ham, writes him a long letter, in which some passages of prophecy are not slowly to occur. The short-sense view of the Idée Napoléonienne is summed up in a few sentences:

But should we, who never were intoxicated by the direct magnetism of your genius, seek in the past anything but the revolution commenced in 1789, and terminated in 1804? You may say that you like, not the reconstruction of the revolution in his person may have been necessary, providential, it certainly was magnificent and brilliant as the sun; but equality proclaimed by La Convention was more dear to it under his sword? Do not think that what is reputable what there was sublime in him—no—but the fatality he carried with him, at what he did not care to begin again with; we do not think it any longer necessary, and we feel it would be fatal. * * * I deem myself bound to protest against those dreams of your heroism; yet it fills me not with horror, for a prisoner has nothing left but his dreams, and it is therefore so very inhumane to contradict them! You regret the time when it was said that these Republicans of yesterday you put without afflicting you. A friend of mine told me, the other day, he had said to you things of the very description calculated to be painful to your feelings; but on seeing that you were thankful for his candour, he would go so far as to meet you in the centre of mind, and your goodness, that he was not able to refrain from tears. Oh! yes, indeed, indeed, I well understand one might shed tears of tenderness over you; but I understand also, that one should pity you from the heart, rather than to betray the GREAT CONQUERESS, THE GREAT EMPRESS, THE GREAT AND MOST HOLY EQUALITY. Are you going to say you are its champion, as well as ourselves? I would desire to believe you, indeed, before your volume, but can do so no longer. You must think us fools for dreaming of attaining the end without using those powerful means in a rather warlike and absolutist shape, as to me, I do no know what we might be doomed to accept—I am not so closely connected with the political world as to have any distinct anticipations on the subject, but I dread the man who would come to spread over the popular legions the wings of the Imperial bird.

We have devoted our remarks in the above notice to the points which seem to bear more especially upon the prominent features of the President's character, his motives of action, and his personal policy. These, however, form but a small portion of the volumes before us, which comprise essays upon a great variety of subjects, not always closely connected with the political world as to have any distinct anticipations on the subject, but the first, "Switzerland, Political and Military;" the "Ideas of Napoleonism," an entire programme of what was done under the Empire, and what is to be expected from its revival; "Historical Fragments," devoted chiefly to a very able and original comparison between the British Revolution of 1688 and the French Revolution of 1830, intended as an answer to some arguments of M. Guizot, in his "Histoire de la Revolution d'Angleterre;" "An Analysis of the Sugar Question," which makes out a case for the native beet root sugar growers (an industry of Napoleon's creation) against the West India: "Extinction of Pauperism," a remarkable scheme for incorporating the unemployed industry of France upon Communist principles; "The Past and Future of the Artillery;" "Opinions on various Political and Administrative Subjects," being chiefly articles which the Prince contributed to a local journal, the Progrès du Pas de Calais," during his imprisonment at Ham.

The style of the Prince is smart and plausible; it might perhaps properly be called epigrammatic. His reading has evidently been extensive; and he seems to have studied as a model that coup de théâtre mode of delivery by which his uncle, in a few short sentences, inspired enthusiasm throughout the ranks of a devoted army, and maintained to the last the unresisting prestige of his name. As a specimen alone we give of the more lively passages of the Prince's efforts in journalism; he thus commences an article attacking the government of the day and their supporters:—

Some years ago there lived in the United States a man named Sampatch, who constructed, with consummate skill, a self-acting machine for the sale of bagpipes, and after having imposed a heavy tax upon the immense crowd which came from all the surrounding districts, he majestically ascended his structure, and from the height of his platform, with the weight of his argument, he played. He repeated the same trick several times, until he was at last engulfed by the current. Now there are some governments whose mode of action in the world in every point resembles the American juggler: their history can be told in these words—laborious scaffolding and a fearful fall.

On some stakes, driven into the ground, they raise an immense unshapen structure, composed of every thing, and heap among the ruins of the past; and after having imposed a heavy tax upon the immense crowd which came from all the surrounding districts, he majestically ascended his structure, and from the height of his platform, with the weight of his argument, he played. He repeated the same trick several times, until he was at last engulfed by the current. Now there are some governments whose mode of action in the world in every point resembles the American juggler: their history can be told in these words—laborious scaffolding and a fearful fall.

The object of the historical parallel between the revolutions of 1688 and 1830 is summed up in the following aphorisms, which the Prince lays down for the guidance of the rulers of the earth:—

1. Monarchs, march at the head of the ideas of your age.
2. If you march behind them, they will drag you on.
3. If you march against them, they will certainly cause your overthrow.

Upon this essay the editor makes the following remarks:—

How the Prince establishes these three positions upon the experience of the history of England the reader will be curious to know, and he must judge for himself, on perusal of the work in which the arguments on which they are supported.

For our own part, we may be permitted briefly to suggest a very opposite view of the question, and to contend—1st. That our great revolution has been successful and permanent, because it was wrought out by the consenting minds of two states in the nation—the aristocracy and the community, united upon a great question involving religious liberty and constitutional right against the personal representative of the then existing dynasty, and degraded the persons of the Stuarts; and, 2ndly, that under that constitution the Royal will and intelligence, although undoubtedly independent of the others, does not commonly put itself in advance of the will and intelligence of the nation, as represented by the nobility, watches the tendency, and weighs the importance of these, as a guide to those measures of policy which it ought properly to sanction. The recent conduct of Prince Louis Bonaparte in France shows that he has been long entertained a very low opinion of what, in the language of debate, is called "the sense of the nation," and that, although in all his writings he has flattered the vanity of his republican people by a pretended deference to their authority as a power-creative power, he will not a low them any constitutive voice in the preparation of measures for the common welfare; in a word, that they may choose, or so carefully choose, their orators, but not even qualify the colour of the laws by which they are to be governed.

A very copious memoir of the Prince's life precedes his works, extending to 160 pages, and divided into seven chapters: 1. Birth, parentage, and education. 2. Insurrection at Strasburg—defeat—exile. 3. Invasion of Boulogne—conveyance to for life escape. 4. Prisoner—member of the Assembly—intrigue. 5. Citizen-President. 6. Coup d'etat. 7. New Constitution. The author is very uncompromising in his exposure of the systematic fraudulency of the Prince's policy, and adduces a variety of documents and facts in support of his views, which seem to denote more of a deeper dye than casual observers of the extraordinary career of this Imperial adventurer are wont to apprehend.

[illegible] President was no sooner firmly seated in power [illegible] he was scarcely established in the Elysée Bourbon—when he began to divest himself of the recent disguise in which for so many years he had concealed the native blackness from his "cheres confreres." But he did not at once effect this transformation—he did not suddenly reveal the hideous features of his moral character. France, he knew, had, in the course of the last sixty years of her career of revolution, become familiarised with monstrous examples of political turpitude and atrocity, but she was not yet prepared for a Louis Napoleon fourbe. Rien n'epouvante pas l'argent-masse; and citizen Bonaparte and three years before him to go through the whole cycle of a criminal career, beginning with perjury, and ending with treason, assassination, and rapine. But we anticipate.

A great variety of notes, historical and critical, are interspersed throughout the work, and a copious portion of the volumes is filled with the coup d'etat appended to it. Altogether we have here a very authentic and complete record of the life, works, and projects of the Prince-President so far as they have gone.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE LIVERPOOL CHESS CLUB.

The annual dinner of this excellent club was held on Wednesday night, the 11th ult., at the Adelphi Hotel. Sir George Stephen occupied the chair, and Dr. Inman the vice-chair; besides whom there were present Herr Löwenthal, the eminent Hungarian chess-player; Mr. Harden, the judge of the Birkenhead County Court; several members of the Rock Ferry and Preston Clubs, many visitors, and an average attendance of the members of the Liverpool Club. The president, Mr. Schwabe, was precluded from being present in consequence of domestic affliction.

After justice had been done to the recherché collection of good things which adorned the table, and the health of the Queen having been drunk in a bumper, the chairman, in accordance with the usage of the society, gave "Prosperity and permanence to the Liverpool Chess Club." He understood that it was also the practice at the meetings of the Manchester and Leeds Clubs to drink considerable skill had been played and recorded. He trusted, therefore, that in future years they would be able to look back to the Great Exhibition as an epoch in chess history from which the world would date many notable advances in the practice and knowledge of chess as a science. He had hoped that upon the occasion of that kind there would have been a fraternization of all the chess circles throughout the world; that they would have met in noble and generous conflict, to show that the game was not only equally appreciated in every quarter of the globe, from the interest to be found in it, but also for its moral tendencies, and for fostering the best qualities of our nature. But he regretted to say that the Tournament had met with considerable [illegible] opposition which he feared had materially tended to abate the interest which would otherwise have been taken in it. The annual meeting of the members of the Liverpool Club, which had hitherto been respected, as one of the most celebrated in the provinces, was a fitting occasion for adverting to some of the features in the controversy that most unfortunately occurred with respect to the Chess Tournament. But in doing so he should refrain from entering into any matters of a personal nature, as he did not think this was a proper occasion for the discussion of them, when they assembled together for convivial purposes, and though indignant in regards some of their scientific brethren. (Hear, hear.) In August last, he was most grieved to see, in a metropolitan newspaper of considerable circulation, a statement which amounted to a serious imputation against one of the players for the remaining competition of the Chess Congress. It stated, and he read it not alone with sorrow but with disgust, that the Tournament was played in secret, and that it was played in secret from one of these motives, either because the player was too ill-disposed to be disturbed, or because they wished to create a wrangle and so avoid defeat, or forsooth to bribe their adversaries to lose important games. That charge was publicly made, and though indignantly repudiated in the Chess-Player's Chronicle and the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, he was sorry to say it had neither been retracted nor had any apology been made by those who hastily preferred it. (Shame!) Shame! It so happened that his (Sir George Stephen) was in that room [illegible] time the Tournament was held, and being a subscriber to it, he went for the purpose of seeing some of the games played. When about entering the room a caution was certainly given to him, as it might be to others, to enter as quietly as he could, because two eminent players were engaged in an important game; but there was no bar whatever placed to his entrance, and no prohibition of any kind. Had there been, he should probably have been disposed, in the more spirited days of lawyer (Laughter)—to insist upon entering as a matter of right. He felt, however, that at such a crisis, and under such circumstances, the intrusion of a stranger might tend to agitate or disturb the self-possession of the competitors, and, as a matter of delicacy and propriety, he took the caution as a hint to withdraw, and he did so. (Loud cries of "Hear.") He had not a shadow of doubt that the scandal which was published in the newspaper in question had its sole source in some similar hint to some party less considerate of what was due to the players (Hear, hear.) Since he had been introduced to his respected friend, Herr Löwenthal, who was a competitor at that tournament, and who was now seated near him, he had asked him whether there was any foundation whatever for the charge, and his reply was that the charge was wholly groundless and false. (Loud cheers.) It was right, therefore, thus publicly to state that this disgraceful charge, as vulgar in its terms as it was odious in substance, had no act of foundation, and that those who made it were deserving of the censure and contempt of every gentleman. (Applause.) With respect to the defeat which Mr. Staunton had sustained, there were many excuses to be made for him. He had not had a fair engagement for the Tournament, under circumstances of singular difficulty and annoyance; and it was hardly fair that even the champion of England should enter into a contest with the first players of Europe with a mind which would be [illegible] and disturbed. (Hear, hear.) He was, however, prevailed upon by those who believed, as he (Sir George Stephen) also believed, that he (Mr. Staunton) was the first player in Europe, to enter upon the contest, in order that no man might not degree the Tournament of any part of the interest [illegible] by the victory of the conqueror of Mr. S. Amateur. (Hear, hear.) In one, two, or three games it was very possible for a man to be defeated under the circumstances, and not in some half-dozen games, but in a series of well-contested struggles, had torn away the wreath from brows that had long worn it with honour, and wore it still.

Great cheering followed throughout the room, and after a few remarks on the necessity of some law being made to limit the period of reflection on a move, Sir George concluded by giving "Prosperity and Permanency to the Liverpool Chess Club."

Mr. Morton Sparke, of Liverpool, in proposing the next toast, said it was a considerable disappointment to them in consequence of new arrangements, on these occasions, those who spoke would be compelled to do so briefly and to the point, for it had been announced that after the festivities games of chess would be played during the night, and those gentlemen who were desirous of breaking a lance with him. Whatever might be thought of the arrangements of the Grand Tournament in the past year, there was no doubt that considerable amount of good would result from it to the chess community throughout Great Britain—particularly with respect to the adoption of annual tournaments, in many provincial clubs, and of matches by correspondence, which were consider ably on the increase. (Hear, hear.) He proposed the health of their worthy president, Mr. Schwabe, who, from nothing but domestic calamity would have prevented from taking the chair. It was with much pleasure that he informed the meeting of the many concurrences in all that had fallen from their respected chairman relating to the tournament in London last year, and was his signal acquiescence in the view stated with respect to the course which led to the defeat of Mr. Staunton. (The toast was drunk with musical honours.)

The Vice-Chairman, in proposing the health of Sir George Stephen, thanked him for his powerful address, and expressed a hope that no suggestion, as to a limit being fixed to the time of reflection on a move, would at once pass into a law in lieu of the policy of which he entirely approved. (Cheers.)

Sir George Stephen, having briefly acknowledged the toast, proposed the health of Dr. Inman, the Vice-Chairman, who replied in a few appropriate remarks.

The Chairman said they were that night honoured with the presence of two gentlemen, one of whom, Herr Löwenthal, was known as a distinguished player, and he knew another who had taken a part in the recent Tournament. They were all acquainted with his games, which had long been known to him (Sir George Stephen), though he had not before had the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with him. He [illegible] another gentleman who was present, but not one [illegible] president of the neighbouring club at Rock Ferry, but who occupied an important [illegible] position. (Hear, hear.) It was indeed a matter of pride for chess that it brought [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

WHO THE NEW MINISTERS ARE.

THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF DERBY—THE NEW PREMIER.

EDWARD GEOFFREY SMITH STANLEY, fourteenth Earl of Derby, eldest son of the late Earl, by Charlotte Margaret, second daughter of the Rev. Geoffrey Hornby, born in London, March 29, 1799, was educated at Christ's Church, Oxford, where he was a distinguished student, and in 1819 gained the prize for Latin verse. On coming of age in 1820 he was returned to Parliament for the borough of Stockbridge, one of those which afterwards disappeared from amongst the constituencies in schedule A of the Reform Bill.

At the general election succeeding the dissolution, under the Liverpool Administration of 1830, he was returned for the borough of Preston; and during the brief Premiership of Lord Goderich (now Earl of Ripon), first held office as Under-Secretary for the Colonies.

At the general election following the dissolution of Parliament by William IV., in the July of 1830, he was again returned for Preston. But in the November of the same year the Duke of Wellington went out of office; and on the formation of the Ministry by Lord Grey, Mr. Stanley received the appointment of Chief Secretary for Ireland, and on presenting himself for re-election at Preston was defeated by Henry Hunt. He was not, however, left without a seat; Sir Hussey Vivian retiring made him a vacancy at Windsor, for which he was returned without opposition.

His entrance upon office in Ireland was at a period of severe trial. O'Connell had opened in earnest the agitation for Repeal, was fierce in his denunciations of the Government, and all-powerful with the people. The potato crop was deficient; the wetness of the season had prevented the usual supplies of turf (the fuel of the great mass of the people) from being saved; pestilence followed fast upon the scarcity of food and fire; the sufferings of the population were intense; the people charged all their miseries upon the Government; and, spite of a relief grant of £50,000, the daily discontent became universal. The agitation for Repeal was daily gathering strength, proclamations were issued prohibiting every meeting announced by O'Connell, and legal proceedings were taken against him for assemblies held in opposition to the proclamations; these he at first met by objections on points of law, but Mr. Stanley resolved at all hazard "to make the Government feared," persevered against O'Connell, who finally gave up his measures of delay, and pleaded guilty.

The session of 1831 was opened on the 3d of February, and at its commencement Lord Stanley delivered a brief but remarkable speech. He admitted that the distress in certain districts was extreme; that it was no exaggeration to declare that the people were suffering from famine; that their petitions praying for help "did not contain a syllable of insubordination, or even of discontent, and were therefore doubly deserving the attention of Parliament. But Parliament had not the means of relief at its disposal. The distress was largely attributable to the landlords of Ireland; their rents were high and exacted to the uttermost farthing, but they subscribed scarce anything to the relief of the people. He concluded by approval of a public subscription throughout England, and the promise of a Government grant to be expended on public works.

In the same session he declared that the Government was fully determined that the law should take its course against O'Connell. The Marquis of Anglesea, then Lord-Lieutenant, and other members of the Cabinet, privately urged such measures as might constitute the great leader of the Irish people, win his support in the approaching struggle for reform, and serve to calm the popular excitement. Lord Stanley took it, by the punishment of the chief, to crush the spirit of "agitation; but, before O'Connell could be brought up for judgment, Parliament, on the 21st of April, was dissolved. Mr. Stanley was again returned for Windsor. The new Parliament met in June, and he then explained that it was the unanimous opinion of the law officers of the Crown that the act under which the prosecution had been instituted against O'Connell had expired with the late Parliament, and that he could, therefore, not be brought up for judgment. The dissolution was essential to the carrying of the Reform Bill; and, placing on the one hand the success of that important measure, and on the other the imprisonment of O'Connell, "he considered what became of O'Connell as dust in the balance." But he contended that the verdict against him had of itself asserted the supremacy of the law, and brought about a change in the system of agitation.

In the same session, and within a week after the introduction by Lord John Russell in the House of Commons of the English Reform Bill, the Irish bill was introduced by Mr. Stanley. Differing widely from the English measure, and not restoring, as had been expected by the people, the ancient forty shilling freehold franchise, which had been abolished on the passing of the Emancipation, it was denounced by O'Connell and Shell, and gave rise in Ireland to a feeling of the bitterest disappointment. The bill, carried through the Commons by a great majority, was thrown out by the Lords. Lord Grey called upon the King to create a sufficient number of Peers to give a majority, and on his refusing, resigned. The attempt to form an anti-Reform Administration failed. The excitement throughout the country was becoming dangerous. Lord Grey was again sent for; the creation of the majority promised, but the Peers made the adoption of the measure unnecessary by an agreement that a number of the non-contents should absent themselves. The bill then, with some unimportant amendments, passed the Lords; and, on its being brought up in the Commons to agree to the amendments, Mr. Stanley, in reply to a speech from Lord Milton, attacking the mode of meeting the opposition in the Lords, and from Sir Edward Sugden prophesying ruin from the bill, and charging the Ministry with having by concessions called into existence the present agitation, made one of his most spirited speeches. He charged upon the Peers themselves the necessity of the proposal, whatever might be its evils and inconveniences, by which their majority against the Reform Bill had been overcome, and put forcibly the importance of the meeting in time the just demands of the people in a new epoch, which we quote from Mr. Roebuck's valuable contribution to the records of the time, the "History of the Whig Ministry of 1830:"—"When the honourable and learned gentleman talks of those who opened the flood-gates being liable to the consequences, he asks who it was, when the waters had been allowed to flow off in many separate channels, and might have been allowed one by one, forced the whole mass of them into one irresistible current, and when they found the mound which they had erected on the point of giving way beneath them, refused those flood-gates, and left to other workmen the task of opening them, or the alternative of being overwhelmed by the bursting of the mound? But is the stream of Reform the only one they have rashly attempted to confine? Have they not dammed up other waters of bitterness which might have flooded off harmless? Was it not the avowed principle of the late Administration to take no step till they were compelled to do so? To resist all demand for improvement of institutions as long as they could, on the ground that when one you mend there is no knowing where to stop? They acted consistently with that principle, but they acted upon it until they could go on no longer."

Later in the same session Mr. Stanley introduced his measure for the final settlement of the tithe question in Ireland. It proposed the collection by armed force of the arrears of 1831. In the course of the debate the question was asked whether the sum to be raised instead of the tithes was to be devoted to any other purpose than that of the Established Church? Mr. Stanley's reply, "that the property of the Protestant Church of Ireland ought not to be diverted to other than Protestant Church purposes," gave rise to an angry debate. The Ministry were held pledged to appropriate a portion of the Church revenues to the general educational wants of the people; changes were proposed in the government and measures for levying to which Mr. Stanley was opposed; and the Ministry were on the point of resignation. The Parliament was, however, dissolved early in December: and between that date and the end of January, 1834, the first Reformed Parliament was chosen. At this election Mr. Stanley was returned for North Lancashire without opposition, and continued in the office of Secretary for Ireland until the following March, when he was appointed Secretary of State for the Colonies, an office which he held until the break up, in 1834, of the Reform Bill Ministry. In the same year he was elected Lord Rector of Glasgow University, and differing with his former colleagues on questions of Irish and colonial policy, he became from that period their determined opponent. He opposed the Whig measure of a fixed duty on corn in 1841, was again returned at the general election in that year for North Lancashire, and on the formation of the Peel Ministry, in the September, was appointed to his former office of Chief Secretary of the Colonies. In September, 1844, he retired from the House of Commons, and in October was summoned to the Upper House by the title of Baron Stanley of Bickerstaff.

In December, 1845, in view of the proposed Free-trade measures of Sir Robert Peel, he retired from office. He had on every occasion, in the Commons, spoken in opposition to the annual motion of Mr. Villiers, on the ground that the supplies of corn from abroad would be so enormous as completely to drive the English farmer from the market. He maintained the same ground in the Lords, opposed in every stage the Free-trade measures of Sir R. Peel, and the measures subsequently brought forward by Lord John Russell for equalisation of the Sugar Duties and repeal of the Navigation Laws; and these measures carried, he applied himself diligently to keep together a party for the restoration of Protection. In every session since the repeal of the Corn-Laws, he has, under some form, raised a discussion upon the subject of the restoration of the Protective system; and, out of doors, has, at conferences, dinners, and meetings, kept alive the same idea amongst the agriculturists. He has admitted the progress of agricultural improvement in Lancashire, though under pressure of foreign competition; but has never, for a moment, in or out of Parliament, given ground for the idea that he had abandoned Protection, or considered as finally settled the question of a tax on corn.

On the resignation of Lord John Russell, in July, 1851, Lord Stanley was entrusted with the formation of a Ministry, but failed to complete his Cabinet. The Right Hon. Earl married, May 31st, 1825, Emma Caroline, second daughter of Edward Lord Skelmersdale. His eldest son, Edward Henry, M.P. for Lynn, holds the office of Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

BENJAMIN DISRAELI, Chancellor of the Exchequer, the popular writer and the able parliamentary debater, is son of the late J. Disraeli, Esq., F.R.S., D.C.L., of Bradenham, the well-known author of the "Curiosities of Literature," and descendant of an Italian merchant of Jewish extraction. Previously to becoming Knight of the Shire for Bucks, Mr. Disraeli sat for Maidstone. He was born in 1806, and is married to Mary-Anne, widow of Wyndham Lewis, Esq., of Greenmeadow, county Glamorgan, M.P., and daughter of John Evans, Esq., of Devon.

SIR EDWARD BURTENSHAW SUGDEN, Lord High Chancellor, is one of the most learned equity lawyers this country has produced. He was called to the bar in 1807, and became King's Counsel in 1822. NEWSPAPER AND PARLIAMENTARY LIST. Dewson and Son.—This very useful little synopsis has just been issued, with the requisite corrections to the re-assembling of Parliament, including a complete list of the members of the House of Commons; the several newspapers, with the days and places of publication, the years in which they were commenced, and the circulation of each in 1850. Advantage has been taken of colour-printing to denote the political opinion of each member of Parliament and newspaper—blue denoting Conservative, and red Liberal; and, among the newspapers, black, neutral The utility of these lists is best attested by the fact or their having been established so long ago as 1809, which long service is likewise a testimony to the accuracy with which the returns have been compiled.

THE RAILWAY NOTE-BOOK;

OR,

JOTTINGS IN THE STATION, THE TERMINUS, AND THE TRAIN.

BY ANGUS B. REACH.

PAGE I.

A PRETENTIOUS-LOOKING building—neither a museum nor a palace, a town-hall nor a gaol with long façades and ranges of doors, and expanses of gravelled yards and great iron gates; and, behind, glimpses of the peaked gables of warehouses, and, perhaps, the wires of a telegraph converging to a focus, and disappearing beneath broad eaves; sauntering policemen, in brown or green, or mulberry or snuff-colour, never in blue; porters—corduroy from the head to the foot; a group of waiting omnibuses; heavy three-horse vans lumbering about; an occasional apparition of a clerk, pen in hand, appearing at one door and disappearing at another—who can mistake, even though deaf to occasional loud vapour-screams, and blind to occasional white spouts of steam, seen beyond crevices and breaks in the white clean buildings, who can mistake the signs and symbols of the railway terminus

The neighbourhood has a character of its own. Perhaps a great palladium-like hotel, conveying the notion of vast halls of coffee-rooms and bewildering ranges of bed-rooms, faces the railway buildings—proud waiters in the whitest of chekers gleaming past the windows, and luggage-laden cabs idle at the doors. But places of far humbler entertainment abound. The taverns have a certain staid and domestic look, as if humbly insinuating that they, too, are inns, and intended for the lawful traveller as well as the chance admirer of malt, and spirits and water. Often a painted bill of fare, as long as the list of tolls upon a turnpike-gate, enables the wayfarer to reckon without or before his host. Corded boxes frequently lie piled about the doors; and packets of sandwiches, or great store of pork pies, intimate that the intending passenger may there victual himself at a moderate outlay. Nor are the less convivial classes of society less cared for. Dingy coffee-houses, with two teacups, one teapot, and sundry shrunken muffins in the window, proclaim upon their faded blinds, that within is to be found "Good Entertainment for Railway Travellers," as if no other traveller was to be entertained on any account. Cheap eating-houses steam forth their clouds of sickly vapour, and hungry boys glance eagerly at the thin trenchant knife slicing the sodden rounds of dubious beef behind the dim and misty glass. Anomalous boarding-houses, breakfast-houses, all manner, in fact, of modest caravanserais, abound. "Good beds" are faithfully promised, and "accommodation for travellers" announced on yellow and fly-spotted cards behind dirty glass. And here note a vagary of our language. Well-to-do people who travel are always "passengers;" poor people are "travellers." Hotels would spurn "travellers;" they prefer "tourists." It is in humble nooks near termini, and in outskirting lanes of country towns, and by the lone roadside, that you will find signs inscribed "The Travellers' Rest," and the "Travellers' Home."

The morning wears on; the quickly-recurring hour for the despatch of a train approaches, and the passengers pour in apace. The early cabs jog easily along; the occupants very generally those fidgetty people who are pretty sure to be too soon or too late. Ladies of all ages and appearances belong to this class, and if they have children with them they come doubly too soon; because, of course, Master Tom or Miss Mary Anne has been in a state verging on lunacy in dread of missing the train, ever since he or she was awake in the morning. The early arrivals are generally bounteously blessed with luggage. You may indeed, always have a shrewd guess at the occupants of a cab by the cabs, as they call them in France, piled upon the seat or roof. Neatly-made boxes and series of leather cases denote the commercial gentleman. He has also one vast railway wrapper at least, and a cravat very nearly as big as the wrapper. The commercial gentleman, however, never comes too soon: he is too old a card for that. In matters of time he always nicks it. The porters know him by instinct, and take up his baggage in a sober, business-like spirit, without the remotest idea of a furtive sixpence. Not so, however, with the flustered fat man with two portmanteaus of different sizes, three carpet-bags, and four miscellaneous-looking boxes. The porters swoop like eagles on the prey, while the cabman fastens, allegorically, his fangs into the befuddled proprietor. Another fourpenny-bit is demanded, and indignantly refused. The bystanders are then appealed to. Bystanders differ. Generous bystander, not having to pay the money himself, oilily suggests, "Pay the man his fourpence." Stern bystander says it's an imposition, and advises steps in reference to the cabman's number, the dispute, as it always does, ending by the cabman bagging his "joey" just before an official learned in fares comes up, and assures the passenger that he has given fourteenpence too much at the least. The aggravation is, however, unheeded, the fat, flustered man being, as it were, dispersed, and mentally subdivided—running frantically after his two portmanteaus, three carpet-bags, and four miscellaneous boxes, which have silently disappeared, and are seen of no man. More cabs, and some pedestrians, the latter with glazed leather bags about as big as purses, and fishing-rods going to angle, down the line; next, perhaps, two sturdy fellows, "travellers," carrying a roped box and three bundles. Here—porters look out—a private carriage; lady, gentleman, no end of children, and not much of nurses; the porters feel a moisture stealing to the roots of their hair as they contemplate the baggage. A cab next, with the young ladies and light bandboxes, with the same number of chests papered over with a purplish integument, and bound, some with ropes, some with strings, some with cordage which bears the aspect of many garters knotted together. The porters quite understand what ladies' luggage is, which is more than any other class of her Majesty's male subjects do; they don't stare to see "Glass, with care—this side uppermost" written in spider-legged letters on pasteboard bandboxes eight ounces in weight; and they look with tranquil composure upon a nervous young lady, proceeding to Harrow or Barnet, or Red Cross, or Romford, or Kingston, with about double the amount of goods and chattels required for a trip to California or Shanghae. Nor do the ladies suffer for their multiplicity of worldly effects. Railway companies charge by the weight, and the quantity of ducks of bonnets and loves of dresses, each requiring a sort of coffin to itself, are it can be properly laid out, which can be conveyed within the stipulated ponderosity of travellers' luggage, is enough to appal the stoutest-hearted and most sanguine in respect to the dividend-railroad director who ever sat at a green-cloath board looking wise over two clean pens and a sheet of foolscap!

The first bell. A general scampering and pressing to the pay-places, and a grand exhibition of purses—long stocking-like affairs, glancing articles of beads, the property of the young ladies; compact porte monnaies, with gilt ciphers: and these last always pay first-class fare. Great divings into the palms of gloves for warm shillings, and an untying of the corners of a cotton pocket-handkerchief on the part of the "travellers" who have carried the great wooden chest.

Observe the different addresses to the clerk at the pay place.

FLUSTERED FAT MAN: Does this train stop at Bullock Smithy?

CLERK: Look at time-bills.

FLUSTERED FAT MAN: Well now; but——

CLERK: Look at time-bills.

HABITUE ON THE LINE: Two—return—second-class—Little Pedlington.

NERVOUS LADY: Oh! if you please, I want to go to Rose Cottage, to Mr. Jones; it's the Drayton station, isn't it? I quite forget—and Mr. Jones—letter—Oh yes, I'm sure—Drayton, if you please, and in the first-class.

"TRAVELLER:" Now then—third-class to Preston, and no mistake—Look sharp, young man.

CLERK: No third class.

"TRAVELLER:" No—eh? When will there be, then?

CLERK: Four twenty-five A.M. to-morrow.

YOUNG LADY WITH THE EIGHT BANDBOXES: Oh, could you give me any information about my luggage.

CLERK: Luggage—apply at Lost Luggage Office.

YOUNG LADY: Yes, but I hope now they're not lost—I ought to tell you that I——

CLERK (sharply): Lost Luggage Office. To next applicant—Must pay for that dog, sir.

MAN WITH THE DOG: What! this little un? Besides, it aint mine, it's my wife's.

CLERK: Can't help that, sir. Two and six. Guard will have the ticket.

We pass the pay-places, and emerge upon the platform.

"Now then, bye leave, bye leave." We once thought this an expression peculiarly and strangely confined to Bullamy, the mystic porter of the Anglo Bengalee Assurance Company, uttered only when he was taking up luncheon to the board. The observant railway passenger will find it, however, to be part of a patois also peculiar to platform porters, when half a dozen of them are trundling down a vast wicker wheelbarrow—with wheels swathed all round with leather or gutta-percha, as if on prosperous lines they had the aristocratic gout, or on small dividend speculations the impending rheumatism—driving down the load of portmanteaus, boxes, and carpet-bags, amongst the clustered passengers, like a scythed chariot of the ancient Britons through a Roman legion; but never, however, shouting their war-cry of "Bye leave!" until they have bundled the machine over the toes of the gentleman to whom the adjuration is addressed.

Meantime the passengers pour in thick and threefold, and the respective carriages for Little Pedlington, Bullock Smithy, and the other famous cities upon the line, are in great demand. The porters generally enunciate replies to questions put to them as to the destination of the carriages which have but one merit, that of variety; and at the last moment a select party of Bullock-Smithians are forcibly adjured by a breathless inspector to turn out of the snug nests in which they have installed themselves, and to take up the places of the flying body of Little Pedlingtonians whom he has just roused out of the Bullock Smithy carriage. More cool or more knowing railway travellers go quietly to their seats and make their dispositions with great composure and deliberation. The first-class passenger is often the most luxurious of dogs. He comes furnished with an array of travelling panoply of the most complicated and elaborate description. First he deposits in his seat, up right in the corner, by way of taking possession, a railway-wrapper, and neatly rolled up as a dinner-napkin, and bound by a dandy strap of yellow leather. Then he spreads over the fat broad cushion several successive strata of pea-coats, paletots, plaids, and thick woolly scarves of bright colours. Next he provides for the security of a bundle of dandy canes, whips, and perhaps a fishing-rod, made up into a sort of faisces, and putting you in mind of the lictors. Afterwards he takes off his hat with care, and produces from an unseen pocket a travelling-cap of the newest and profoundest description, which he arranges with a due air of grave grandeur: and then, having completed what is called in theatres his "make up," he stalks majestically along the platform, or stands swinging the open door of the carriage, and won't go in upon any account until the wheels have actually begun to move.

Our second-class friends tumble in (carpet-bags, parcels, baskets, valises, and all) with much less ceremony, and very soon form compact rows of men, women, and children, each pervaded by a strong sensation of sitting on uncommonly hard seats. Indeed, we have heard the theory received with great applause, to say nothing of belief, by a company of ladies and gentlemen thus enthroned, that the directors of railways send deputations of skilful carpenters all over the world trying for the hardest sorts of wood to make second class seats of. And there can be not the least doubt but that the skilful carpenters perform their mission to admiration. A goodly number of passengers, first and second class, are no sooner settled in their seats than they begin to be tormented with grievous doubts about their luggage. They have a strange development of an anomalous mental phenomenon which satisfies them that their luggage is in the wrong carriage, and that it will infallibly be carried down some junction or branch line. The young ladies with the armada of bandboxes are in a special state of discomfort, and, after sundry efforts to be bold enough one of them timidly accosts a loitering porter:—

"Oh, you know, if you please, whether my luggage is safe?"

"Certainly, ma'am; all right," replies the unblushing and unconscientious functionary, who would have said the same thing if the lady had no luggage at all. "You may depend upon it, ma'am, it's all right;" and the questioner is silenced, if not convinced.

Meantime adieux are going on with great vigour upon the platform, and through the open doors of carriages. The anguish of a young lady with curls, whose sister is going down to pass three days at Harrow, is heartbreaking to contemplate. Her only consolation is in epistolary prospects:

"And oh, Maria, mind you write write, dear, as soon as you arrive, and tell us how you got on, and whether there was any accident; now don't forget, Maria, or you know how wretched we will be, Pa, and Ma and all of us thinking something dreadful has happened."

Another specimen of a different class:

"Well then, old fellow, I suppose we need not look out for you for the next five years, or so, at all events."

"Not a bit of it, by Jove, if then."

"Well, take care of yourself; don't get too much into the sun and be having fevers and all that sort of thing."

"All right."

A third specimen:—

"And, Charley, now, don't stay too late, dear, at that club, when I'm away. Don't, dear. You know it's not right, that you're not strong by any means. And, Charley, don't go to theatres. And you will often look in in the evenings and play at whist with aunt Rose? She expects it, Charley: you know she does. And, Charley, do you think you'll be lonesome, dear, in the long evenings? You must write me then, you know, oh, such long, long letters. And take particular care of fire, Charley; and I know that Susan and Mary Jane will make you comfortable. You just tell Susan what you would like for dinner, and she'll get it—and tell Mary Jane that she's not to go out after tea to her cousin's—and, oh! I forget—just step to Dossitor, the butcher's, and say that I'll pay the bill when I come back—and at the same time write to the people at Paddington for more coals—and—and—Charley—and"——

Ladies and gentlemen, take your places."

And the porters begin to bang to the doors, while the engine, which has just come round from the shed, gives a little jerk to the train as it is backed up to the luggage van, and the hissing scathing vapour, rising like a tree, is suddenly, as it were, flattened and spread abroad as it comes in contact with the symmetrical iron and glass of the station roof.

Now is the last chance for the purchase of Journals. The newsboy, with a tray slung round his neck, reeking with wet *Times*es, *Herald*s, and *Chronicle*s, runs from window to window, and the odds is that five independent gentlemen purchase five copies of the same journal—a knowing and judicious arrangement, which enables each of them, when politely offered the paper by his neighbour, after the first fifty miles, to respond by the courteous reciprocity of another, a copy of the selfsame broadsheet. Now, too, arrives the last moment of choice for the bewildered student of railway literature, who, utterly puzzled by the embarras de richesse, fidgets backwards and forwards along the glistening presses radiant with gay bindings and white satin-like wrappers—bewildered among Tales for Trains, Stories for Stations, Readings for Railways, Handbooks, Guidebooks, Tracts for Tunnels, Travellers' Libraries, and all the vast outpouring of prose and poetry intended to shorten the iron-way and kill railway time. Shall he be imaginative and take to novel-reading—scores and scores of fascinating names shine from the books' backs. Shall he be observant and purchase a handbook of the route, giving him the exact height of all the church steeples to be seen from the rail? Shall he be scientific, and study the steam-engine? or shall he devote himself to useful knowledge, and purchase a neat-looking tract on the habits and customs of the bug, or the history of wooden-leg making? Nervously and fidgettingly he jumps from book to book—reprints, original works, newspapers, reviews. What shall he chose? The time is waning. The proprietor of the stall has twice said, "Now, then, sir." A guard rushes past folding up a paper—the waybill. A fat inspector, dressed like an etherealized policeman, holds up a green flag, and——

"Here! here! anything!" shouts the victim of too many and too tempting books. His hand is on "Bradshaw's Railway Guide." "I'll take that——"

"Shilling, sir."

It is paid; and with a strong mental heartburn, exactly like that which was experienced by the dog who dropped the meat to bite at the bigger shadow in the brook, the man who was too difficult to please leaps across the platform, bounds into the moving carriage, and dashes himself down in dissatisfaction into his seat, just as all his neighbours assure each other, as a curious and interesting piece of intelligence, only to be found out by remarkably 'cute individuals, that "We're off at last!"

(To be continued.)

INLAND BOOK POST.—A notice, dated February, has just been issued from the General Post-Office, in which, on and from the 1st March, the following additional facilities will be afforded to the transmission of books, &c., within the United Kingdom:—A book-packet may thenceforth contain any number of separate books, maps, or prints, and any quantity of paper, vellum, or parchment (to the exclusion of letters, whether sealed or open); and the books, maps, paper, &c., may be either printed, written, or plain, or any mixture of the three. Further, all legitimate binding, mounting, or covering of the same or of a portion thereof will be allowed, whether such binding, &c. be loose or attached; and, in short, whatever is necessary for the safe transmission of literary or artistic matter or usually appertains thereto. The following are the remaining regulations respecting the inland book post, all previous notices regarding it being cancelled:—Rates of book postage: For each package not exceeding 1 lb. in weight, 6d.; exceeding 1 lb. and not exceeding 2 lb., 1s.; exceeding 2 lb. and not exceeding 3 lb., 1s. 6d.; and so on, 6d. being charged for every complete pound and for any additional fraction of a pound. The postage must be prepaid in full, by affixing the proper stamps outside. Every packet must be sent open, without a cover or in a cover open at the ends or sides. No packet must exceed two feet in length. The book post to which the foregoing rules relate is confined to the United Kingdom, and does not affect the privileges allowed to votes and proceedings in Parliament, or to newspapers. If the post-master, upon the examination of a book-packet, find any letter, whether sealed or open, or sealed enclosure of any kind, such letter or enclosure must be taken out and dealt with as an unpaid letter—the address on the packet being written thereon if there be no other address. If, for any reason, the post-master does not think that the packet comes within the privilege of the book post, he may post it into the bag for London, if in England—for Edinburgh, if in Scotland and for Dublin, if in Ireland—in order that the case may be dealt with at a metropolitan office. To prevent obstacles to the regular transmission of letters, any officer of the Post-office may, when necessary, delay forwarding a book-packet for a period not exceeding twenty-four hours beyond the time at which it would otherwise be forwarded.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 549.—VOL. XX.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, MARCH 13, 1852. [SIXPENCE.

THE NEW MINISTRY AND ITS OPPONENTS.

BEFORE we again address our readers all the new Ministers will have been re-elected, and the Parliament will have re-assembled. It is probable, also, that the country will have been informed, on the highest and best authority, what policy is to guide the Derby Administration. In this case we shall be enabled to judge whether the war of faction is to be renewed with its usual bitterness, and whether Lord Derby, hopeless of success for any measures which he may be induced to propose in an Assembly in which his party is known to be in a minority, will risk an immediate appeal to the country, or go out of office.

In this short interval it may be well to consider who and what are the opponents of the Administration, what bonds of union or causes of disunion exist among them, and what would in all probability be the effect upon the country of their success, either in driving Lord Derby and his friends from power, or in forcing him to a premature dissolution of Parliament. Lord Derby himself and all his principal colleagues have, as we remarked last week, laid more stress upon the fact that they are of necessity Ministers in default of any other competent or influential persons, than upon the fact that they have hitherto been the consistent opponents of free trade in corn. But the various parties who view the formation of the new Ministry with alarm insist, and, as it appears to us, with very questionable discretion and still more questionable fairness, that Lord Derby is Minister, not in default of others, but because he is a Protectionist, bound to restore Protection, or to make the attempt whenever he has the opportunity. But, in common justice, it should be remembered that Protection is a wide subject; that many persons who opposed Sir Robert Peel when he attempted to touch that sacred article in bucolic eyes, "corn," voted with, and otherwise supported him, in the reform of the Customs Tariff, which led the way for that final and greater change; and that all or nearly all of the gentlemen who are now associated with Lord Derby, as well as Lord Derby himself, have taken no little pains to draw a distinction between doing and undoing—between disapproving of the repeal of the Corn-laws in 1846, and re-imposing the Corn-laws in 1852. To say nothing of the opinions of Lord Derby,

THE WAR IN KAFFRARIA.—THE 74TH HIGHLANDERS ATTACKING MACOMO'S KAFFIRS AND THE HOTTENTOT BANDITTI, AT THE HEAD OF THE WATERKLOOF PASS.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

Mr. Disraeli, and Mr. Henley—every one of whom has at times been accused by the ultra-Protectionists of abandoning Protection—there is scarcely a member of the Ministry who has not left himself a little door of escape from the grim fortress of Bread-tax. Mr. Herries himself—the "Giant Despair" of the party—the venerable Nestor of the old ideas—has relaxed. He is already thawing in the sunshine of the warm truth that has at last broken through the icy crust of his prejudice. Popular starvation is no longer the fetish that he has set up, and to which he would offer sacrifice; and, though he affirms his regret, his sorrow—nay, his profound and poignant grief, that the trade in corn is free, he takes especial care against pledging himself to any attempt to fetter it again. In short, the Ministry, collectively and individually, are so embarrassed by their past speeches in opposition, that they cannot make clean breasts of it all at once, and in plain terms confess a change of opinion; but it is obvious to all unbiassed and disinterested spectators, that, if left alone, they will run no risks to restore Protection, the Stuarts, or the Heptarchy. Lord Derby may have as sentimental a love for Protection as Lord John Manners has for James II., and may dislike free trade in corn as much as the noble Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests dislikes the immortal memory of William III., but both of them will cling to the established order of things. We should as soon think of accusing Lord John Manners of disaffection to the House of Hanover, because he has written verses in praise of the Stuarts, as of accusing Lord Derby of a wish to revolutionise the country by attempting the restoration of the Bread-tax, because he has expressed his sorrow that the tax was taken off. Bygones are bygones with both of the noble Lords, and with their colleagues also, or the broadest of all broad hints are no longer intelligible or serviceable in politics.

The Anti-Corn-law League, and its more prominent members, have certainly more right than any other party in Parliament or out of it to show a distrust of the present Administration; but—as the more sensible and prudent members of that once powerful confederation would be the first to admit—the existence of the League is a public evil, and ought only to be revived to avoid one still greater. Let the League be cautious, therefore, and avoid the beginnings of strife. Enough has been done to shake the old energies still survive, and that the old organisation is still attainable when a legitimate end is to be sought. The League should not thrust its rist into people's faces. A man may be willing to admit that two and two are not five; but if told with foul language and insulting menace that he must do so on pain of the high displeasure and vengeance of another, who has no right to dictate to him, he is very apt to grow indignant, and to refuse acquiescence even in that which he knows to be true. If the League have any other objects in view than good government and an adherence to the sound commercial policy which Sir Robert Peel carried out, it will become as much a nuisance as it was once a benefit. There is, at all events, no necessity for any further action on its part at present—a fact of which it ought to be convinced by the discovery, which it has no doubt made by this time, that a party, with which it has never yet been able to coalesce, shows a determination to be as vigorous as itself in the game of opposition, before there is, in reality, anything to oppose. And this brings us to Lord John Russell and his supporters.

The ex-Premier, who threw up the Government in a huff, and raised a Free-trade loan when there was none in the pleadings, has already marshalled his adherents, and vaulted into the seat of Chief of her Majesty's Opposition. The League and the Radical members, Irish as well as English, led away by their own impetuosity, or by their fears that Lord Derby will do what he has said he will not do, will find themselves mere joints of the Whig tail; and if Lord John Russell is clever enough by himself, by Mr. Charles Villiers, or by some other member, whose course may not yet be chalked out for him, to raise a debate, of which the issue shall be a vote of want of confidence, the party will be that Lord Derby will resign, or that he will dissolve Parliament forthwith. In the first supposition we would ask the League, and all the Opposition who are not Whigs, what they would gain? They would, it is true, be assured that the Corn-laws would not be re-imposed—but of that they may be assured at present; and for this barren assurance we should have Sir Charles Wood again in office to mismanage the national finances, and shut his obstinate eyes against the public advantage—Lord Grey again in Downing-street, to offend and misgovern all our colonies—and Lord John Russell taking another snooze of somnolent incapacity, varied by occasional starts of mischievous vigour. Is this a consummation so devoutly to be wished? And, in the more probable alternative of an immediate dissolution, forced upon Lord Derby by the factious opposition of antagonistic parties, united in nothing except in their hatred and mistrust of an untried Government, is there anything to be gained by those who have hitherto been considered the friends of a liberal, enlightened, and progressive policy? We think not. If compelled to dissolve Parliament by any factiousness, the Government would infallibly gain many votes; and, supposing it to be a Government desirable to defeat hereafter, the difficulty of defeating it would be proportionably increased.

Yet there are issues to be raised, which, if not quite so important as that of the re-establishment of the Corn-laws, are only second to it in their probable effects upon the prosperity and contentment of the country. Upon these points the new Ministry must be compelled to declare itself, if it do not immediately volunteer an exposition of its policy. If it should turn out that Sir John Pakington's views on the sugar question are those of the whole Government; that the opinions of Mr. Herries upon the Navigation Laws are those which Lord Derby is prepared to carry into effect; or that Lord Malmesbury's ideas of a great national poor-rate, and one great slough of British pauperism, as bad as that in which Ireland is plunged, are the ruling ideas of Mr. Disraeli and Lord Derby, and deemed to receive their support—the sooner the facts are known, the better. An appeal to the country upon these points, and upon many others, would, in all probability, lead to the return of a Parliament with which a liberal and enlightened Government might safely work. But that the re-establishment of a Russell Administration would be the result of such an appeal, we as little believe as we do in the re-establishment of Protection. The country requires a government that shall be able to stand by its own merits, and not by the forbearance of its foes, that shall be supported by its own inherent health, vigour, and capacity; and that shall not, like the crazy cab-horse of the novelist, be only prevented from falling by the shafts of the vehicle to which it is attached. But whatever form opposition to the Derby Administration may be destined to assume—and we by no means assert that it will not meet and receive opposition from all the true friends of rational liberty and commercial common sense—we but express a general feeling, when we assert that the opposition commenced in the first place by the Grey-Russell Whigs, and in the second by the revived League, looks premature and injudicious. It is possible that a Derby Administration may not, but it is quite certain that a Russell Administration did not, prove a good one.

The Amazon fund now amounts to above £11,000. It will be kept open for about another month, and it is most probable that it will ultimately reach £12,000. The final disposal of it will be made on the 10th inst., by the united committees of Southampton and London. About 150 persons have to be assisted or supported by it; amongst them are 70 children and about 40 widows. About 30 of the children will be placed in orphan asylums. Mrs. Symons, the widow of the commander of the Amazon, has declined assistance from the fund.

THE WAR IN KAFFRARIA.

We have been favoured by a Correspondent with the Sketch engraved upon the preceding page, accompanied by the following communication, detailing a very interesting episode of the war in Kaffriland:

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

CAMP ELIBWATER NOV. 18, 1851.

The united forces of the 1st and 2nd division having been for the greater part of the last month, and the beginning of this, engaged in a series of most important operations upon Kreomy and Buffalo-back heights, and in the kloofs surrounding them, I take the earliest opportunity of sending you a Sketch of one of the most melancholy events that has occurred during the present war, and by far the most disastrous that has happened to the 1st division. It represents the 74th Highlanders, on the 6th of the present month, attacking the dangerous fastnesses at the head of the Waterkloof Pass (the impregnable stronghold of Macomo's Kaffirs and the Hottentot bandits who have joined him), in which occasion they lost and gallant regimental chief, the brave Lieutenant-Colonel and two other officers, besides twelve men killed or dangerously wounded. At half-past four o'clock on the morning of the above day, Colonel Fordyce's brigade marched from their camp towards the head of the Waterkloof, the summit of the mountain range, along which they moved, being enveloped in clouds until shortly after sunrise, when they cleared off: the brigade was then formed in position, the 74th was detached to the left to form up them, two companies entering it in skirmishing order, and the rest acting as supports and reserve. This was executed the difficult nature of this almost impracticable ground, the whole of which is studded with enormous masses of rock, forming insurmountable barricades, covered with dense underwood and fallen trees, affording a safe cover to the stealthy foe, and facilitating his deadly aim. The village at the edge of the wood, upon the left, having been rebuilt since the 24th of Nov., 1850, when it was destroyed by Lieut. King, of the 74th Highlanders, was again burnt by the same officer, with a party of four volunteers, and the skirmishers being thrown forward, Colonel Fordyce leading them in person through the bush; when, while giving his orders, he was shot through the body by a Hottentot concealed in a tree, and fell mortally wounded. He was immediately carried to the rear, and received medical assistance, but shortly afterwards expired. In the meantime the gallant regiment advanced to the very edge of the enemy's stronghold, from which, in answer to their fire, rose at intervals a light puff or two of dark-brown smoke, and the fall of many a gallant soldier testified to the certainty of the enemy's aim. Lieut. Carey, a brave and promising young officer, was shot through the breast, and died soon afterwards, without speaking or betraying any sign of consciousness. The time I have chosen for my Sketch is the moment when, as he was serving ammunition to some of the men who had expended theirs, he received the fatal bullet. Some of the wounded are seen being borne on stretchers to the rear, and others are seen lying upon the ground, groaning and calling for water. Lieutenant Gordon was wounded soon after, the ball passing through both thighs, fracturing the bone of the [illegible] and entering the body of a young bear [illegible] who, as well as himself, died a few days subsequently. Late in the afternoon the troops were withdrawn from the bush, and made their bivouac upon the cold, damp ground upon the heights; where, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, the groans of those who were suffering from their wounds, all whose duty did not call them to exertion were seen buried in deep and thankful sorrow for the loss of so many of their gallant comrades. The next day, but the severity of the weather compelled us to abandon the heights, and form our camp in the valley, at the junction of the Blinkwater with the Kat River, where we still remain, skirmishing frequently with the enemy's marauding parties, who make most daring, and, in some instances, successful attempts upon our cattle. I am, &c., T. BAINES.

We have intelligence this week from Cape Town to the 9th, and King William's Town to the 4th of January, from which we learn that at last affairs at the seat of war appear to have taken a more satisfactory turn, the Kaffirs having been, on more than one occasion, repulsed with great loss by our troops, and upwards of 27,000 head of cattle having been taken from them. The increased energy in the movement of the Government troops, the result of the arrival of reinforcements from home, had infused greater confidence among all classes, and it was generally rumoured that Sandilla was about to retire from the hostile position he has hitherto held. It was considered, however, that the home Government had not acted wisely in superseding Sir Harry Smith.

The casualties among our troops have been comparatively slight, but we regret to find that Lieut. Wade, R.A., has fallen in an engagement with the enemy. The gallant officer was shot while leading on his men in an attack upon the enemy in the jungle of the Fish River, where, it is said, Sandilla has now taken shelter. The lamented deceased was honoured the bravest and most active officers in the field. On every occasion where hard and gallant service was demanded he distinguished himself.

According to the local papers, the Basuto tribes in the Orange River sovereignty were at the last date (Dec. 22) quieted and unsettled, in consequence of attacks made on them by reputed allies of the Government, the Plattberg Bastards and Barolongs. Previous to these attacks, the people of Moshesh were disposed to abstain from violence. Since then the farmers along the boundaries have suffered severely. The Basutos, who, on the 14th of December, attacked three waggons belonging to some trek-boers, and captured a number of cattle and horses. Two companies of the 45th, under Captain Parish, and a detachment of artillery, under Lieutenant Singer, have been mentioned for the protection of the chief Maroco and the Barolong tribe; and Lieutenant Bourke and twenty-five of the Cape Corps have marched to Winburgh to enable the district farmers to return to their homes.

The Natal Witness of the 18th of December removes all doubts as to the re-appointment, who was at the head of the Zoolon contingent in the Sovereignty. He has returned with his forces, partly because they were not imperatively required, and partly because they had been afflicted with dysentery.

LAMARTINE AND NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.—Baron Jerzmanowski, a colonel of the Posh lancers of the old Imperial Guard, has written to M. Lamartine, to correct, on his own authority as an eye-witness, several anecdotes contained in M. Lamartine's recently published "History of the Restoration," relating to the return from Elba. This is M. Lamartine's reply:—"I thank you for your rectifications. I will make use of them as of an irrefutable testimony. With regard to my judgment upon the institutions and the policy of Napoleon, it must necessarily differ from yours as widely as our points of view are different I understand, and I honour the fidelity of enthusiasm of a brave lieutenant for his general. Gratitude wears a bandage over its eyes as well as justice. But I, a man of another religion, love the independence of all nations, but I may have the right to love the independence of the nation of which I form a part. I desire morality even in glory; in short, I abhor despotism, and I must logically and from my heart judge with severity the man who was the most formidable instrument of despotism. Receive, Monsieur, the assurance of my high consideration. LAMARTINE. Paris, March 4."

THE TUILERIES.—The repairs and embellishments in the Tuileries are going on rapidly. All the apartments on the ground-floor, looking into the garden, are finished. The rooms looking on the court, which were formerly occupied by the Queen, the Princess Marie, and the Duchess of Saxe-Coburg, will be [illegible] next. Those last-named apartments, it is thought, will be occupied by the Prince [illegible] the Duke de Nemours.

IMPIETY AND DESTRUCTION IN THE UNITED STATES.—The religious imposture called "Spiritual Rappings," when seemed to have died away, has been revived in all its absurdity. On the evening of the 5th ult., a Mr. Brown entered at Mozart Hall, Brooklyn, on "Spiritual Manifestations," in the course of which he gave a most extraordinary history of his own experience, his unbelief at first, and then his conversion to the faith of the rappings, which was equal to that of St. Paul's miraculous conversion by an overpowering light from heaven, exceeding the brightness of the sun at noon-day, when all who were with him saw the light, but he alone heard the voice of the spirit. The New York Herald says that the narrative of Dr. Sch., who was accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Harris, exceeds all belief, and is enough to "make each particular hair of the head stand on end, like the quills of the fretful porcupine." The lecturer connected them with the second Coming of Christ, and said the spirit had informed him that these manifestations were designed by Heaven to prepare the way for the advent of the Messiah, which, according to the doctor, is at hand.

THE ENGLISH ABROAD.—The following is an extract of a letter from a British resident at Leghorn, dated Feb. 20, 1852: "They are talking of making all the British take out permission from the police every six months, and some every three months; and every time the permission to remain is renewed there is about 5s. 6d. to pay, and every one of a family to have a separate one, which would come to a considerable tax. Their object is twofold:—First, to raise money; and, secondly, to frighten Austrians, and, should, to have it in their power to send any away when their leave is out. The old merchants who have been born and lived a few years here are quite indignant at this. There was a public meeting at the Consulate to-day about it."

A man of the name of Crosse having been killed, and another of the name of Gauthier having had his leg broken, by the falling of a quantity of earth on the Western Railway of France, the Tribunal of Correctional Police tried certain parties connected with the railway for not taking the necessary precautions to prevent the occurrence of such an accident. Longé, the assistant-engineer, who had allowed the mass of earth to be undermined in an imprudent way, and two workmen, named Bois and Fenat, who had done the undermining, were severally condemned to three months' imprisonment and 50f. fine, and to pay 4000f. damages to Gauthier. For the payment of the damages, M. Emile Pereire, director of the company, was declared civilly responsible.

Four of the rooms comprising the Gallery Charles X., at the Louvre, Paris, have just been re-opened to the public. They are occupied with Grecian and Etruscan vases, Gallic vases, and the collection of antique terra cotta articles which has been recently formed.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

THURSDAY, March 11, 1852.

Paris is just now in a serious mood, the religious services of Lent never having been—judging from the numbers who daily crowd every church, and the throng of equipages at the doors—more scrupulously attended. Few parties are given; and, in fine, everything is looking rather dull, save the beautiful weather, which, neither affected by religion or politics, is as clear, bright, and sunny as May. The Champs Elysées and Tuileries are even putting on a tender livery of green, but only to be nipped by the frost and cold which inevitably follow the delicious warmth of a premature spring in [illegible] meantime, the work of demolition and beautifying the city is rapidly going on. Some alterations are making on the Place de la Concorde which seem of more than doubtful taste; it was already so magnificently perfect.

Some antiquarian discoveries of the greatest interest have just taken place near the Palais des Thermes, hitherto generally supposed to have been constructed by Julian the Apostate. Some adepts, however—and among them Dulaure, the author of the celebrated "History of Paris," had always entertained an opinion that the parsimonious habits of the crowned philosopher would have prevented him from entering into so costly an undertaking. The demolition of some houses, for the widening of the Rue des Mathurins St. Jacques, has led to the discovery of a stone employed in the construction of the foundations, which appears to have been the upper part of an altar. It is covered with stars very roughly carved, and on the farthest face the half-effaced representation of the sun may be seen. Julian was a worshipper of the sun, and it is supposed that this image was placed by him in the palace constructed by his father Constantius, as the following half-obliterated inscription would seem to prove:—

Ho.. Q..OJ Exxit .... AtrVm
virtVs Constanti
D..VI ....ohs Ornav.. Alt.. R.. virtVs Juliani Cæ sars.

The meaning of which is evidently this:—"This palace, built by Constantius, was ornamented with the divine image of the Sun by Julian Cæsar." More discoveries are expected as the demolitions proceed.

Among the buildings lately pulled down on the place du Carrousel, preparatory to the termination of the Louvre, is the Hôtel Longueville, the residence of the beautiful Duchess of that name, celebrated for her support of the Fronde and her gallantries, as much as for her beauty. In the arched roof of one of the cellars two skeletons of a very large size, and in a perfect state of preservation, were discovered, and have since been the object of many discussions on the part of antiquarians, but either ash faiter ils est. Another discovery was made close by the skeletons, more interesting in a literary point of view; namely, that of a box, in carved steel, embellished with gilded brass knobs, and containing several papers. Among them is an unlucky epistle in verse, from the Prince de Marsillac to the fair Duchess. The other papers are letters relating to the state of affairs at that time; some from the hand of the celebrated Fureuse, with memorandums, &c. of the Prince de Conti, of great value to autograph collectors.

A very ingenious plan was lately resorted to by the Ministry of Police for the discovery and arrest of malefactors, chiefly echappes from the hulks, who were known to be domiciled in Paris, but who contrived to elude every attempt at detection. A late police decree authorised the strictest search, and hundreds of individuals, who had no visible means of existence, were sent from the capital; still a number of these mauvais sujets remained undiscovered, and the frequency of robberies and nightly outrages continued undiminished. Government at last hit on the plan of sending to the bagnes of Toulon and Brest for several of the keepers and gaolers of those great convict dépôts, to whom the persons of all their former prisoners were perfectly known. These functionaries, accompanied by a policeman in plain clothes, perambulated every part of Paris by day, and by night frequented all the theatres, from the grand Opera downwards, the taverns and dancing-houses. It appears that no less than 400 of these desperadoes were recognised and re-transferred to their old quarters at Toulon. Some of these worthies had been carrying on schemes of swindling on a colossal scale, and more than one has been described as having entered into large speculations on the Bourse. One of the most noted in the craft was known by the sobriquet of Pierre Mandrin, the name of that celebrité being conferred on account of his superiority and skill in escaping from durance. When arrested he was figuring as a Polish Count, and covered with expensive rings and jewellery. The career of this ruffian presents many features of interest. In 1839, while undergoing an imprisonment of two years for robbery, he attempted to make his escape by bribing the gaoler—he failed, however, and was sent to the galleys for twenty years. In 1846 he succeeded in making his escape from Brest, and, notwithstanding the greatest exertions on the part of the police, he succeeded in crossing the whole of France, and gaining Belgium, where he remained for some time. Owing to the persecutions of the Belgian police, he subsequently returned to Paris. He was so unfortunate as to be captured in the very act of breaking into a house at Besançon, but his prodigious activity enabled him to escape while on his way to prison, and he came to Paris. Being possessed of some money he resolved to abandon his evil courses, and set up in the Rue Rambuteau a greengrocer's shop, which went on thrivingly for some time. But such an inactive life was insupportable to him, and he broke up his trading establishment to resume the exciting pursuits he had abandoned. Several robberies committed with consummate skill soon informed the police of the presence in Paris of some great master of the art of manœuvre. The most experienced officers were accordingly sent out, but they made no capture until a few days since, when one of the Toulon gaolers above mentioned fancied he recollected the convict under the features of an elegantly-attired lion on the Boulevard des Italiens. A few hours afterwards the luckless echappe was safely lodged at the Conciergerie. At his lodgings, besides the usual housebreaking implements, a complete assortment of costumes of every kind was discovered from that of the dandy of the first water to the blouse of the artisan. It is remarked, however, that, notwithstanding the wholesale removal of so many of this dangerous class, the number of nightly crimes and robberies was never greater than at present.

FRANCE.

All the elections throughout the country of "Deputies in the Legislative Body," as they are to be officially designated, have resulted, with but five or six exceptions, in favour of the Government candidates, and the first session both of the Senate and the Legislative Body has been summoned for the 29th inst. Meanwhile, as if the sham character of these pseudo-legislative chambers were not sufficiently manifest already, the "Prince-President" continues by his decrees and impromptu organic laws to overturn and remodel, in the fashion most agreeable to his own conceptions of autocratic government, the most important of the institutions of the State. This week the delicate and difficult question of the constitution of the University of France and of Public Instruction is the principal subject upon which his decretal legislation is brought to bear; and by it the irremovability of the Professors—in the case of the Judges noticed last week—is put an end to, and thus their entire dependance upon the Government made certain. According to the decree on the subject which was published on Wednesday, the President of the Republic appoints and revokes at will the members of the Superior Council, the inspectors-general, the rectors, and the professors of faculties. The Superior Council is composed of three senators, three councillors of state, five archbishops or bishops, three members of the Court of Cassation, five members of the Institut, eight inspectors-general, and two members of free instruction. The members are nominated for a year, and are presided over by the Minister of Public Instruction. A new plan of studies will be discussed during the next session. The preamble to the decree announces that it is only of a provisional character, preparatory to a complete re-organisation of the Ministerial Department of Public Instruction.

Another decree imposes upon every public functionary the necessity of taking an oath of allegiance, in accordance with Art. 14 of the Constitution; and orders that in case such oath is refused, or its terms modified in any way, the person so acting shall be considered as having given in his resignation. Special decrees, it is added, shall determine the mode in which the Ministers, members of the great bodies of the State, officers in the army and navy, magistrates, and functionaries shall take the oath in question. The general impression on the public mind relative to this measure is that it is directed against General Cavaignac, whose alleged intention to appear in the new Chamber on its opening, in spite of the first against all the laws occurred since the 2d December, refuse to take the oath, and then retire, has been already noticed.—

M. Hault, who is accused by his opponents of entertaining strong Socialist opinions on many subjects, has been appointed President of the Legislative Body. The appointment has excited some surprise. M. Billault had not sent in the list of names from which the President was a member of the Constituent for the Loire-Inférieure. He had obtained considerable celebrity as an advocate at Nantes, and was member of the Council General of the Department in 1837, when the colleges of the department nearly all returned Democrats. He began his Parliamentary career in the ranks of the Opposition by a vehement speech on "electoral corruption," and another on the relations of France with foreign countries. His hostility to the Cabinet, and especially to that were then termed by the Opposition the "English tendencies" of M. Guizot, was incessant and uncompromising. In 1842 this was still more marked during the strong debates on the right of search; and in the subsequent session he skilfully and unscrupulously availed himself of the excitement occasioned by the Pritchard indemnity to denounce the Government. During M. Thiers' short Administration he was named Under-Secretary of State in the department of Commerce and Agriculture.

A body of rules and regulations relating to the Senate has been published by its President Marshal Prince Jerome Bonaparte. They have been chiefly adopted from the rules of the old Legislative Assemblies, and embrace the different duties of the grand referendary, the secretary, and their officers. No one can have an employ in the Senate who is not a born Frenchman, if he is not of the age of 40, or if he is more than seventy. The State messengers are to be chosen in preference from superior officers on the retired list who have been decorated, and for all the other posts officers of different ranks will also have the preference. Most of the functionaries and inferior employés of the old Chamber of Peers have received appointments in the senate.

The last of the Emperor Napoleon's "Marshals of the Empire," Frederick Auguste Louis Viesse de Marmont, Duke of Raguse, died at Venice, on the 3rd instant, in the 78th year of his age.

Reports having been in circulation in the early part of the week, that serious differences had arisen between the President of the Republic and General St. Arnaud, the Patrie has published a "communicated note," which gives a flat denial to such statements. The same journal also declares, that the return of the French Ambassador from London, respecting which various rumours had been circulated, is entirely on private business, which may detain him about ten days.

On Monday last the President of the Republic gave a splendid dinner to the new English Ambassador, Lord Cowley, at which were present the Marquis and Marchioness of Douglas, Lord and Lady Poulmont, and Lord and Lady De Grey.

A banking establishment, it is said, is about to be organised for the President.

M. Miot, ex-representative, has arrived at Havre, with 160 other persons condemned to transportation to Cayenne and Lambessa, in Algeria. They are to be taken by steam from Havre to Brest, whence they are to proceed to their destination.

SWITZERLAND

It is understood in well-informed political circles, both in Paris and Berne, that the differences hitherto existing between the Federal Government and that of Louis Napoleon have for the present been settled in a manner more or less satisfactory to all parties concerned.

The question of the confiscated property of the celebrated hospital of the Great St. Bernard and the St. Gothard has again been opened in consequence of the proposed further sale of the hospital lands. The Paris Journal des Débats publishes a letter from M. Clet, the delegate of the hospitals, to the Council of State of Valais, protesting against the sale of the lands. M. Clet's letter is dated Paris, Feb. 25, 1852. Appended to it is a copy of a protest made by Paris on the 5th of October last by M. Clet, and ratified by the Abbé Filliez, prior of the hospital, against the sale which was then proposed. The protest states that all purchasers of the lands in question will be held liable to actions by the hospital for their restitution.

UNITED STATES.

The advices this week from New York are singularly barren of interest.

It is remarked as a proof of the general feeling of the country being little changed in favour of Kossuth's policy of intervention in the affairs of foreign states, that the birthday of Washington has been celebrated throughout the States this year with more than usual respect, owing to the almost universal belief that the safety and prosperity of the United States are absolutely dependent on the observance of his wise policy of non-interference. Kossuth, however, still speeches away in the remote Western provinces, obtaining as much money as he can for the Hungarian cause! At the last date he was at Covington, in Kentucky. The German revolutionist, Kinkel, arrived from the provinces at New York on the 21st inst., and addressed a large meeting of his countrymen in favour of the national loan by which Germany is to be regenerated. He is about returning to Europe, with some thousands of dollars obtained by subscription.

The Congressional banquet in honour of Washington's birthday took place in Washington city on the evening of the 21st ult., and was well attended, considering the inclemency of the weather. Commodore Stockton presided, assisted by General Taylor, of Ohio, and Mr. Venable, of North Carolina. Mr. Crittenden spoke, reviewing the life, character, and services of General Washington—a field that afforded ample room for his peculiar talents—is generally spoken of as the marked feature of the evening. Gen. Scott, in answering for the army, very appropriately confined himself to that particular topic, declining to introduce political topics upon a purely patriotic occasion.

At New York the same festival was observed on the 22d. The military were reviewed on the occasion; there were also a procession, fireworks, &c., and other festive displays, all winding up with a magnificent banquet in the evening.

The only feature of political news is the announcement that the Cabinet was engaged on the 24th in investigating serious charges against the Governor and Chief Justice of Mexico. The charges were of such a character as, if at all sustained, must lead to their abrupt dismissal

The King of Sardinia has conferred the Cross of a Chevalier of the Military Order of St. Maurice and Lazarus on Doctor Granville, in consideration of his long and gratuitous service as physician to the Sardinian Legation in London.

AN ANCIENT MONUMENT.—On Friday week the workmen employed in the removal of the ruins of the tower of Cockermouth Church discovered a portion of a monument erected to the memory of "Sire Richard de Lorme," supposed to have been a Knight Templar of the 12th or 13th century. In addition to the words we have quoted, the slab bears the representation of a key, and a cross-hilted sword of the description peculiar to the age of chivalry.

A PROTECTIONIST PASHA.—The Pasha of Egypt, who is constructing a railway, has departed from the plan usually adopted in foreign countries where they first take up the railway system; namely, employing a large proportion of English workmen. He has seen the benefit which his own people might derive from the works, and has therefore employed English engineers only, leaving the manual labour to his own people.

FATAL ACCIDENT AT HAMPTON COURT PALACE.—On Wednesday an inquest was held at Hampton Court Palace, before F. J. Manning, Esq., Coroner of her Majesty's Household, and a jury composed of the yeomen officers of the Palace, on the body of Miss Julia Gordon, aged 18 years, daughter of Lord Henry Gordon, residing at the Palace. It appeared that, on Saturday morning, Miss Gordon was perceived running out by the study enveloped in flames, with no other covering but her night dress, which was partially burnt upwards. Her screams brought Lady Henry Gordon to her assistance, who succeeded in extinguishing the flames, but not without suffering severely. The unfortunate young lady was so dreadfully burnt that she died on the following Monday morning, having lingered to that time in great agony. It was stated that she was in the habit of using the lamp near the window in the study, adjoining her bedroom, in her night-dress. Verdict, "Accidental death."

JOINT STOCK COMPANIES.—On Wednesday a paper was printed, by order of the House of Commons, showing the number of licenses granted by the Board of Trade, from Feb. 20, 1851, to the 24th ult., to joint stock companies to hold lands, tenements, &c. There are twenty-eight companies mentioned in the document, to each of which a grant for thirty-one years has been made to hold lands.

ANNUITIES TO THE INDUSTRIOUS CLASSES.—From a return just printed, it appears that from March, 1834, to July, 1851, 6779 annuities were granted under the 3d Will. 4, c. 14, to the industrious classes connected with savings-banks and benefit societies, of which 1008 had fallen in. The annuities now payable were £113,345 is.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

LONDON UNION ON CHURCH MATTERS.

A report was presented by the Committee of the London Union, and adopted at the ordinary monthly meeting held at St. Martin's Hall on Tuesday. It states that, since the last meeting of the Union, an important revolution has taken place in the position of political parties in this country, which it is impossible to pass by without, and then goes on to observe:—

"The Church is entitled to demand of those in authority, of whatever political party, justice and fair play, but cannot wear the sword nor receive the wages of any. Above all, Churchmen should be aware of resting their hopes of the redress of grievances on the result of any political combinations whatever. The rights of the Church are not to be secured by the instrumentality of party, but by the union and co-operation of Churchmen of all parties.

"The committee feel it their duty to draw attention to that portion of Lord John Russell's speech delivered in the House of Lords on Friday, the 27th of February, in which he alludes to the great questions of education and the Church.

"The language Lord Derby uses is of course somewhat indefinite.

"It is not, therefore, without considerable hesitation that the committee would venture to suggest that two prominent ideas which Lord Derby enters not, in proposing a grant to the Church, was the desire to maintain the Establishment in its external rights and property; and your committee cannot doubt in attributing to his Lordship the intention to advise the Crown to make a better use of its patronage than of late.

"If this be below our wishes, the committee would urge that it be remembered that the duties of the Prime Minister relate rather to the external framework of the Church, considered as a society of this world, and to the internal organisation as a Divine institution; and that the same feelings which would prompt us to refuse detention from the officers of the State in sacred things, should lead us to forbear from unjustly advancing. It may not be amiss to draw attention to the remarkable words Lord Derby used respecting the interests of the Church beyond the limits of this country, words which can hardly import the erection of a Church establishment where the feelings of the community would be averse to it, and which, therefore, probably point to such measures for the colonies as we have already requested—measures of religious freedom and wholesome self-organisation; and the committee need not remind you that what is now created in the colonies must infallibly be so long known this country also. They think, it is true, that there is every encouragement to the Irish duty of laying down the cement of Church grievances and calling for redress.

"The committee think that the appointment of a separate Committee of the Council on Education, and can only be duly settled by synodical action, and those which are external, and may be safely referred to Parliament.

"Your committee believe that provisions of this character would not have found their way into any bill if the Synods of the Church had been permitted to deliberate upon this whole subject of national education, and to advise with Parliament thereupon.

"Our great want is Synodical action; and as a first step to it we ought immediately to ask for license for the convocations to make canons, and in the first instance to reform themselves. In this it is neither to be expected nor desired that any Ministry should take the initiative. It is the duty of the State to ascertain, before granting a demand involving a departure from existing practices, that the demand is general, and that it is made in a spirit of moderation as may give promise that it shall be used for good and not for evil. It is our business that this should be ascertained by respectful, above all, both in and out of Parliament. We must take no denial on the part of the Government to be final, as a final and complete refusal of justice. Denials, as politicians well know, often effect the preliminary to concession, if they stir up to diligent and patient exertion.

"There are, however, things of no small importance which the Government may do for us at once. In the case of foreign chaplains, the Foreign Secretary might recognise the license of the Bishop of London, and take care to act in concert with him, and so prevent the recurrence of the evils which have caused so much scandal in the island of Madeira and elsewhere.

"As another specimen of what the Church may reasonably expect in the way of redressing actual grievances, the committee desires to specify interference on the part of British Consuls and other Government officials with the Oriental Communions, by the attempt, unfortunately too successful, to draw away their members to a general Protestant body in the East, intended to connect various sects without any dogmatic profession.

"Upon very many such points, changes in the administration of the Government would satisfy Churchmen. Where those who maintain the school desire it, we can see no valid reason why the management of the school should not be in the hands of the clergyman of the parish, and the schoolmaster be required to be a communicant. Your committee have much satisfaction in informing you that the Sub-Committee on Education is steadily engaged in preparing a report in continuation of their report of August, 1846. This report is intended to be published immediately, and a copy will be placed in the hands of all the members of the Union."

APPOINTMENTS AND PREFERMENTS.—The following appointments and preferments have recently been made:—Rectories: The Rev. G. Black to Inch; the Rev. John Brown to Kirk-Andrews-upon-Eden, Cumberland, with Blackford; the Rev. Joseph Gerlis to Wickham, Kent; the Rev. John W. Davis to Throwleigh, Devon. Vicarages: The Rev. Richard Bull to Dovercourt-cum-Harwich; the Rev. William Bell, to Ramsey, Essex; the Rev. George Rickle to Tiverton, Somerset; the Rev. William Walter, of the Close, to the Rev. G. D. A. Tyler, M.A. (B A 1824), Trinity College, Oxford, to Langford, Somerset; the Rev. H. Wood to Lyme, Somerset.

TESTIMONIALS.—The following clergymen have recently received testimonials of esteem and regard:—The Rev. Wilham Cape, minor canon of Peterborough Cathedral, and late head master of the Cathedral Grammar-school, from the Dean and Chapter of Peterborough; the Rev. W. Harrison, vicar of St. Oswald's, Chester, from his pupils; the Rev. George Fitzroy Kelly, of St. John, Pembroke Dock, from the parishioners and congregation; the Rev. E. F. Ribbans, assistant-curate and head master of the Grammar school, Leek, from members of the congregation, and other friends; the Rev H. S. Wright, late of Phillack and Gwithian, Cornwall, from the parishioners; the Rev. Francis Sandham, of Winchester, from his parishioners.

WORCESTER CHURCH.—The restoration which has been lately in progress at Lambeth Church having brought to notice the dilapidated state of the tombs of the Tradescants and of Elias Ashmole, some of the more energetic of the parish-ners have undertaken to repair and raise a subscription for their repair, for which purpose about £100 is required. The elder Tradescant came over from the Low Countries to England towards the end of the reign of Elizabeth, and was appointed by that Sovereign as Lord gardener. To him we are indebted for many plants which he introduced into this country; and he proved that, by care and attention, almost every vegetable might be cultivated in this climate. The elder Tradescant was succeeded by his son, who died in 1662. The museum formed by them passed, on their death, to Elias Ashmole, and, in 1680, was given by the latter to the University of Oxford.

ST. PAUL'S, COVENT-GARDEN.—On Tuesday the east front beneath the portico received further decoration by the erection of two escutcheons of Lord Russell's arms. They have the novelty of being kept purposely light in appearance, so as to soften the glare which the darkness of the portico gives. They are surrounded by a very rich moulded border, painted and stained on a crimson ground, and having on either side a margin of bright blue, which end see a succession of quatrefoils, alternately red and white. The escutcheons, the central point of intersection ornamented with a green rosette. Down the centre of each window is a rich scroll ornament, on a bright crimson ground. The escutcheons, which are of the Lord Russell arms, and which, resemble a tastefully-arranged collection of rubies, emeralds, sapphires, topazes, &c. The expense will be defrayed by subscription amongst the parishioners, collected through Mr. Wilson, the churchwarden, who is indefatigably exerting himself to promote the general embellishment of this beautiful specimen of the skill of Inigo Jones.

THE GOVERNMENT SCHOOLS OF DESIGN.—It will be recollected that the close of the Great Exhibition an authorization was obtained from the Lords of the Treasury by the Board of Trade, for the expenditure of £5000, purchasing a selection of objects calculated to serve as models for study in the different departments of manufacture. The choice of the best examples was entrusted to a committee, consisting of Mr. Cole, Mr. Owen Jones, Mr. Pugin, and Mr. Redgrave; and this committee, acting on the instructions received by it, has formed a very admirable and beautiful collection, which will henceforth be placed at the disposal of the different Government Schools of Design throughout the country.

On Saturday last Mr. M. Digby Wyatt gave a lecture on the Education of the Eye, at Weybridge, in aid of the Mechanics' Institute. He explained the structure of the eye, to show its capability of conveying education to the mind, by duly cultivating an observation of the various forms and other peculiarities of natural and artificial objects. The elements of form, perspective, light and shade, and colour, were illustrated by references to a profusion of prints and drawings, lent for the occasion by the Government School of Design. The utility of drawing-schools to all classes of the community was especially enforced by the lecturer.

At an adjourned meeting of the ironmasters of South Wales, held on Tuesday, at Morley's Hotel, the following decision was come to unanimously:—"That a general reduction of 5s. a make of iron, although in itself desirable, does not appear to this meeting, under existing circumstances, to be capable of being carried out by arrangement at the present time.

CLANDESTINE AND IRREGULAR MARRIAGES IN THE DIOCESE OF LONDON.

The Bishop of London has addressed the following letter to the clergy of his diocese:—

London-House, March, 18[illegible]

Rev and dear Sir,—I am desirous of calling your attention to a matter which affects, not only the interests of individual clergymen, but the character of the Church, from its extent of influence, and the moral welfare of the community.

I allude to the practice of solemnising marriages by banns between parties who are not residents in the parishes where the banns are published. This practice, it is admitted, is not only subject towards those of the clergy who exercise greater care in that respect, but is calculated to defeat the ends of those regulations, both of the canon and statute law, which are intended to prevent clandestine marriages. Within the last few years I have had my attention called to so many irregular marriages, solemnized between minors, in the churches of parishes in which neither they nor their parents or guardians were resident, that I feel it to be my duty to take some steps for preventing the continuance of what I cannot but regard as a great scandal to the Church, and as productive in many cases of great misery to unfortunate persons [illegible] and solemnising marriage without due inquiry as to the residence of the parties, they are offending against the law and put the person who is to give away the bride to the difficulty of such inquiry, cannot be admitted. This has been again and again declared by the most eminent and learned expounders of the law.

Lord Eldon (Nicholson v. Squire, 16 Ves. 260) said:—

"We [illegible] clergyman, a notion seems to prevail that everything is correct, if a paper describing the parties between whom banns are to be published, were handed up to the clergyman in the usual manner of divine service, he publishes them without more. It is true that a marriage by banns is good, though neither of the parties was resident in the parish; but, if a clergyman, [illegible] that he is not privileged upon [illegible] resident in the parish, he is liable at least to ecclesiastical censure, perhaps to other consequences. It has been notoriously said, especially as to marriages in London, that the clergyman cannot possibly ascertain where the parties are residents. But I see no objection which a court before whom the consideration of it may come cannot possibly hear. The act of [illegible] has given the means of making such inquiry, and, if the means provided are not sufficient, it is for a well-regulated legislature to give the clergyman who has not used those means, that he could not find out where the parties were resident, either of them. If he has used the means given to him, and was misled, he is exonerated; but he can never exempt himself if no inquiry was made. The habit of taking the description of the parties from loose way makes it very easy [illegible] in the individual clergyman [illegible] is not the notice to be [illegible] of Parliament, which has in many cases required, for the first publication of banns, regular notice, or certain shall be obliged to publish banns, unless the persons to be married shall, seven days at least before the time required for the first publication of such banns, respectively, have ceased to be resident, &c., by a notice in writing of their true christian and surnames, and (not of the parish, but) of the house or dwelling in which they respectively shall have lived, and of the time during which they have lived in such house or dwelling respectively, to the officiating clergyman, therefore, have only to require the notice in the case they have represented to be [illegible], and to inform [illegible] of what the statement is true.

Again, in the case of Priestly v. Lamb (6 Ves. 421), he says:—

"I know that this subject is carried on with a negligence and carelessness that draws in gentlemen of good intentions, and I feel that it may be very difficult in the clergyman, with all possible diligence, to execute this duty as effectually as the law seems to require that they should execute it; but we are a case has occurred in which it is clear that if any one of the parties had done what the law required of all of them this marriage could not have taken place, I must say it amounts to a criminality which I hope will not occur in future."

The learned Dean of the Arches, in the case of Wynn v. Davies and Wesver (Carruis 69), admitted articles against a clergyman, for having frequently published the banns without that particular notice on the expiration of the seven days; but, if he chooses to dispense with that notice when he is satisfied he acquires, and if it should turn out that the parties are not entitled to have the banns published in his parish, he must take upon himself the consequences of his own neglect to do that which the law has provided for his security, he cannot be allowed to shelter himself under the excuse that he was ignorant of the fact of their non-residence in his parish, when he might and ought to have inquired into the fact."

The Legislature has authorised the minister to require seven days' notice of the publication of banns, for the express purpose of giving him time to inquire; the law does not, but he may inquire at any time before the last publication, so that there is time enough for him to make such inquiry, either himself or by some other person.

After consultation with several incumbents, I am satisfied that it is in the power of every parochial clergyman, if not altogether to prevent the irregularity complained of, yet greatly to diminish the frequency of its occurrence, by adopting the following regulations:—

1. That a banns book be kept, in which the residence of each party whose banns are to be published may be entered, specifying the street, and the number of the house.

2. That at some time before the first publication of the banns, or at all events before the last, due inquiry be made as to the fact of such residence.

3. That a copy of the entry which is to be made in the register be written in the book (which, of course, the signatures); a precaution which I have reason to believe has prevented the solemnization of marriage within the forbidden degrees.

I need hardly remind you that the efficiency of these precautions will depend upon their being generally practised. If the laxity complained of be suffered to continue in some parishes, while it is restrained in others, it is obvious, not only that facilities will still be afforded for clandestine marriages, but that the clergymen who neglect the provisions of the law will be gainers at the expense of those who observe them, than which nothing can be more unfair.

Commending the matter to your serious consideration,

I remain, reverend and dear sir, your faithful friend,

C. J. LONDON.

Colonel King, of Streton Hall, met with a severe accident while hunting with his drag on the Duke of Richmond's hounds on Saturday last. While crossing a foot wooden bridge, near Sproxton Thorns, the horse's feet slipped from under him, and both were precipitated into the ditch. Although the horse did not fall upon him, Colonel King received a severe bruises on his head, one or two of his ribs were broken, and he was otherwise much shaken. He was immediately taken to the Castle, where he was attended by Mr. Thomas Douglass, surgeon, of Knipton, who appeared very remedy when the case entered.

LAMBING EXTRAORDINARY.—Mr. Hall, of Sibthorpe, has a ewe which produced him five fine lambs on Monday morning last. The dam and her united produce, the whole of which she suckles, are doing well, and there is every probability that with a little assistance all will be reared. This is the only instance on record of more than four at a birth from one ewe. They consist of two males and three females.

REGISTERED DOCUMENTS IN PUBLIC OFFICES.—It appears by a Parliamentary return, printed on Tuesday, that there were received by the Treasury 22,288 registered documents in 1850; 23,390 in 1840; and 25,[illegible] in 1846. The reduction in 1850 is accounted for by the discontinuance of [illegible] and the improved system of arrangement.

SHIPS' BOATS FOR SMALL TRADING VESSELS, COASTERS, AND STEAMERS.—A general order communicates certain relaxations by the Board of Trade of the present requirements as to boats. It appears that, as regards vessel's or steamers carrying passengers, they are still required to have the number of boats specified in the act. 1. Sailing-vessels not exceeding 190 tons may substitute one efficient boat for carrying the crew; and collapse (sling) boats, if they carry the larger number of boats, their dimensions may be spread over the whole. 3. For boats of both steam and sailing ships measurement to be taken outside of length and breadth, inside for depth, measuring from the top of the [illegible] strake.

SWINGING THE "GREAT BRITAIN."—On Monday this splendid craft left the quay at Liverpool, at which she had been for some weeks lying, for the purpose of having her compasses adjusted by observation. The operation is a most interesting and important one. This floating castle was swung to every point of the compass, and the bearings of the compasses attested to the correctness by the sun, which shone brightly, to the delight of many interested spectators. Among those on board were Mr. Robert Bright, of Bristol, Mr. Samuel Bright of Liverpool, and Captain Claxton, to whose spirit exertions at Dundrum Bay may be attributed the preservation of the ship.

The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company received official notification on Saturday last, that their tender for conveying the mails to India and Southampton and via Marseilles, had been accepted. The company will build a steamer of above 3000 tons and 1200-horse power, to afford still more luxurious accommodation than their efficient vessels already possess, and to perform the distance from port to port in a shorter space of time. In the meantime the company have come into the proprietorship of the new steamyacht built for the Pasha of Egypt by Mare and Co., of Blackwall, of 3000 tons, with engines of 800-horse power, and will be in a position in the course of a few months to give travellers some idea of steam-navigation improvements in 1852. Under the new contract a branch line will start from Singapore and terminate at Sydney in Australia, calling at Swan River, Adelaide, and Port Phillip. The steamer will start alternately every month from Singapore to Sydney.

BURMESE COSTUMES, WITH ROAD AND PAGODA, AT MOPOON.

INDIA.—THE BURMESE WAR.

IN the news from India which we published last week, the chief feature of intelligence was the commencement of hostilities between the forces of the East India Company and those of the King of Ava, arising out of his refusal to redress the grievances inflicted on British merchants at his seaport of Rangoon, by the agents of his Government and others. The evils in the present case have been aggravated by the deceit and treachery so characteristic of all Oriental Governments, but which, in this instance, have had only the effect of bringing down more forcibly upon the Burmese troops the decisive and effective chastisement which can alone inspire respect with semi-barbarous nations.

Should it be found necessary to prolong hostilities, the experience acquired in the last Burmese war will enable our troops to avoid the errors arising out of want of acquaintance with the localities of the Burmese territory, both on the side of the sea-coast and of the Bengal frontier, and will prevent the expenditure of blood and treasure which that contest occasioned, while the facilities afforded by steam navigation for the speedy operation of a large force from Madras present advantages which were unknown in the last Burmese contest.

It is only by vigorous action that we can expect to produce beneficial effect in dealing with a Prince who, like the present representative of the dynasty of Allombra, is completely under the control of the women of his zenana, who are leagued with a vile set of court intriguers, whose tyrannical enormities have, within the last twelve months, excited two insurrections in Ava, which were attended with the slaughter of 5000 victims. It is said that the King, when Lord Dalhousie's letter was read to him, dashed it down on the floor, and in a fury ordered the barbarian ships of war to be driven out of the river.

The interest and importance attaching to the subject call for a fuller notice of it than we gave in our summary of Indian news last week.

In the mail previous to the last we had accounts from Rangoon, dated Jan. 2, which led us to believe that the ready submission of the Burmese Government to our demands on receipt of the letter of the Governor-General of India was only feigned, in order to gain time. The result has proved the accuracy of these suspicions. Their object was only to gain time, and within a week the war began. On the 4th of January the new Viceroy of the province arrived at Rangoon, and immediately proceeded with a series of acts in the last degree suspicious. British subjects were once more insulted, and the late Governor, whose insolence had occasioned our remonstrances, was taken into favour. A polite message sent by the Commodore, requesting to be informed when a deputation from the squadron would be received, was met with derision, and afterwards with a flat refusal. The deputation having presented itself was informed, by order of the Viceroy, that he was asleep, and all intercourse with the shore and fleet was forbidden. Matters having come to a crisis, Commodore Lambert, on the 6th, directed all British subjects immediately to embark, and offered refuge in the squadron to all who desired it; sixty unfortunates, who were endeavouring to save their property, were detained and thrown into prison. The events on this trying occasion are thus described by an eye-witness:—

Between three and four in the afternoon, a message was sent from the flag-ship, requesting all British merchants, and all those who claimed British protection, to proceed on board the vessels without delay, to receive a communication. There the Commodore stated to them what he had done to maintain pacific relations, and how signally he had failed. He informed them that the British Government and flag had been grossly insulted by the Burmese authorities, and that the insult was manifestly intentional, and not accidental. He therefore gave them two hours to leave the town, and promised them all the protection and assistance in his power. Mr. Edwards had also been sent into the town from door to door, to warn all foreigners to quit it. There were more than twenty-five vessels in the river, and a boat was sent to each one to direct that all refugees should be received on board, and that the vessels should then weigh anchor and drop down below the town. The Proserpine steamer ran close in to the main wharf, and eight or ten boats from the frigate and steamers came to the shore to protect and receive the fugitives. Meanwhile the streets were filled with armed Burmese, and Burmese officers were moving to and fro on horseback, threatening all who gave assistance to the foreigners, in consequence of which not a Cooley could be procured. All classes of foreigners—Moguls Musulmans, Armenians, Portuguese, and English—were seen crowding down to the river with boxes and bundles, and whatever they could carry, but they were obliged, generally, to abandon all the property they possessed. Mr Kincaid, the American missionary, left his library, consisting of more than 1000 volumes, the collection of twenty years, behind him to be destroyed—too happy, however, to find his wife and children safe under the British flag. Many, however, ventured on shore again before night to procure a few articles but not a few of them were detained.

The fleet, in the meantime, proceeded to the opposite side of the river and remained at anchor for twenty-four hours, the steamers being busily engaged in towing the lesser vessels out to sea. At length the Viceroy warned the Commodore, on the 9th, that, should he attempt to move down the river, the squadron would be fired on from the shore. On the morning of the 10th the Fox was towed down and anchored within 400 yards of the stockade; the steamer, having returned to bring away with her a Burmese man-of-war, was fired on as she neared the Fox with the prize in tow. The fire was immediately returned with great vigour. The enemy dispersed after some 300 of them were supposed to have been slain. The squadron then proceeded on its course, and the river ports of Burmah were proclaimed to be in a state of blockade—an arrangement conditionally agreed upon beforehand by the Governor-General. Commodore Lambert proceeded immediately to Calcutta to receive further instructions. The campaign, however, owing to the immediate setting in of the hot season, cannot be fairly commenced until October, by which time a reinforcement of steamers may be received from England should this be deemed requisite.

The following is the notification of the blockade:—

In virtue of authority from the most Noble the Governor-General of British India, I do hereby declare the rivers of Rangoon, the Bassien and the Salween above Moulmein, to be in a state of blockade; and with the view to the strict enforcement thereof, a competent force will be stationed in or near the entrance of the said rivers immediately.

Neutral vessels lying in either of the blockaded rivers will be permitted to retire within twenty days from the commencement of the blockade.

VILLAGE IN THE BURMESE PROVINCE OF TENASSERIM.

Given under my hand, on board her Britannic Majesty's frigate Fox, off the town of Rangoon, the 6th of Jan., 1852.

(Signed) GEORGE ROBERT LAMBERT,
Commodore in her Britannic Majesty's Navy.

By command of the Commodore,

(Signed) JAMES LEWTHER SOUTHEY, Secretary.

Our demands upon the Burmese Government are said to be as follows:—

1. The expenses of the expedition of 1842, when Tharawaddy induced us to fortify Moulmein, amounting to about 20 lacs of rupees
2. Restitution of the logs of timber stolen from our side, and taken to Martaban in Mr. Gwyn's time, or the value, not estimated.
3. Restitution of all moneys extorted from British subjects at Rangoon, and the amount of Aga Bukker's decoity, amounting to more than five lacs of rupees
4. Expenses of the present expedition.
5. The sum of 6000 rupees, to be paid yearly in advance, to cover the expenses of the monthly steamer from Calcutta visiting Rangoon on her way to Moulmein.
6. If at a resident at the Court of Ava and a Consul at Rangoon be supported by the Government of Ava.

The King, in his reply to the letter of the Governor-General, says he had cause of complaint against the Rangoon Governor, and had been instituting an inquiry into the same, when a petition was received from the merchants at Rangoon in the Governor's favour, which put an end to that inquiry. He expressed surprise that a large naval force should have entered the Rangoon river, and stated his willingness to see every justice done to British subjects.

BURMESE COSTUMES.—ROAD IN MOULMEIN.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

We this week engrave three characteristic Sketches of Burmese life. Hereafter we shall present our readers with a series of picturesque Views in Burmah.

The costume of the Burmans, though upon the whole not unbecoming is much less so than the flowing and graceful garments of the western nations of India. The fabrics worn are comparatively coarse and homely. Umbrellas, which are in general use among all classes, are among the principal insignia of rank and office.

The first Illustration shows a specimen of the male and female costume of the Talains, with a distant pagoda and dwellings at Mopoon. These people, also called Peguans, at no very distant period formed an independent and powerful nation, but at present they are not very numerous. They call themselves Moan, and occupy, nearly exclusively the low country between the Delta, the Irawaddi, and the Salween river

VIEW IN THE ILES DU SALUT, IN FRENCH GUIANA.

In the Delta itself they are mingled with the Karens, but form the greater part of the population.

In the second Engraving is seen part of a village of Karens or Karians, in the province of Tenasserim. The figure with a gun is a Shau, from Zemoni; the two other figures are Karens, male and female. The Karens live partly intermixed with the Peguans in the Delta of the Irawaddi, and are the most industrious cultivators of the soil. They occupy also the hilly and mountainous country on the upper branches of the Setaing, near Tongo, where they are stated to have preserved their independence.

The third Scene is sketched from a road in Moulmein: the figure leading a child is Anglo-Burmese; next is an unmarried Burmese girl; the figure carrying a tray is a Burmese woman of the lower class; and the sitting figure is a market woman, selling cheroots.

THE MILITARY COLONISATION OF FRENCH GUIANA.

The wholesale deportation to Cayenne of those whose opposition might interfere with the free exercise of the absolute power which the President of the Republic has assumed, has suggested to the French Government the idea of renewing the project, often formed and as often abandoned, of colonising Guiana. Doubtless Louis Napoleon might have found a more favourable field for his colonisation scheme, but this is not his only mistake. The idea of founding a military colony in Cayenne is one of those rash enterprises which could originate alone in the brain of a Bonaparte. The precarious position of the French possessions in the north of Africa shows that the day is gone when the plough and the sword could be confided to the same hand. The example of the English colonies, on the contrary, shows how much more can be done under free than under military institutions. It may be urged, perhaps, that the French Government is bound to make use of the presence upon the soil of Guiana of the numerous convicts, and the soldiers necessary to guard them; but humanity might have whispered the severity of transporting to a pestilential climate men whose chief crime was that of being vanquished. Let us add, in case the French Government has any idea of the project prospering, that the signal failure which has attended every attempt at colonising French Guiana is sufficient to dispel every hope.

Soon after the discovery of America, the French first appeared in Guiana. In 1555 a colony of Calvinists founded a settlement there, which was soon dispersed. Up to 1635, several trading companies, under Royal auspices, successively failed in their respective attempts at colonisation. It is from this latter epoch that the first French establishment at Cayenne dates. It was not more successful than its predecessors; still the attempt was renewed in 1643 and 1652, and finally abandoned in 1653. The Dutch then possessed themselves of the colony, but in 1664 the French retook it. Some years later the English became its masters; but they soon abandoned it. Up to 1672, when Cayenne definitively fell to the share of France, the Dutch disputed its possession.

M. DE CASABIANCA, THE FRENCH MINISTER OF STATE.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

The sea-board of French Guiana extends 300 miles, from the river Marauny on the north-west to that of Oyapoco on the north-east. It has the advantage of not being marshy. French Guiana stretches into the interior about 400 miles. The coasts are open and easily accessible. Cayenne, which is the chief town, is situated on the southern part of the island of that name. The port is on the west of the town, at the embouchure of the river Cayenne, which divides before falling into the sea, where its twin banks form two headlands inclosing a natural harbour. The soil of the island is low and marshy. The hills are the only spots where agriculture is any way successful. The low land consists of extensive prairies or savannas, almost always flooded during the rainy season, which lasts nine months. These inundations are a source of permanent unhealthiness. The excessive drought of summer, under the influence of which clouds of noxious insects are generated, is again a scourge from which it is almost impossible to escape.

The only portion of French Guiana at all favourable for colonisation is comprised between the rivers Macouria and Sinamary. This district is generally fertile, as well as being the most healthy. Many nuclei of towns have been formed on the strength of these advantages, but they have never acquired any importance. The principal of these are the those of Sinamary and Kourou. The latter might, from its favourable position, aspire at becoming the chief town of the colony, if there were any obvious advantage in undertaking the enormous works which its present condition would render necessary. It is to the district of Kourou that the transports are destined. Here, in 1714, the Jesuits founded an establishment, which gradually drew together the neighbouring Indian tribes, and so the town was begun. Situated 40 miles north-west of Cayenne, it is placed almost at the embouchure of the Kourou, in the cove formed by that river. The entrance of the river is defended by precipitous rocks, two miles in extent; and by a sandbank on the western point, which considerably reduces its mouth. The river is otherwise very fine, and navigable by small vessels. The best method of entering the river, coming from Cayenne, is to make for the Iles du Salut, passing them at five miles distance. When they are left to the northward, the north-west point must be made for, until it stands west about a mile and a half off, and must not be approached nearer. Then bear away for the church of Kourou, keeping in the middle of the river, so as to avoid the sandbanks at the sides.

For a long time the difficulties of this passage have suggested the propriety of abolishing the port of Kourou, and of forming an artificial bay by means of the Iles du Salut, situated in front of the mouth of the river, ten miles off. These islands, three in number, and grouped triangularly, are separated by a small channel. Keeping the isles north-west, they stand thus:—On the left, l'Ile St. Joseph; in the centre, and farthest off, l'Ile Royale; and on the right, l'Ile du Diable. Latitude, 5° 16′ N.; longitude, 54° 52 W. L'Ile Royale, the only one that is accessible at all times, is a little more than half a mile in length, and about one-third of a mile at its greatest width. It is bounded on the north by reefs; the southern coast is very woody, but the vegetation is stunted. The bottom between these isles and the continent is soft mud, and generally affords good anchorage.

The French Government appears resolved to carry out the long-conceived project of uniting these islands by means of moles, which would form a large basin opposite Kourou. This project has something in it gigantic, in comparison with the end it is destined to serve. When it is considered that the territory of Kourou is very limited, it is obvious that so magnificent a port is a downright superfluity; and it is doubtful whether the access of population which the Republican decrees will give to it, will ever impart sufficient prosperity to it as to render such a luxury necessary. In fact, the greater part of the colonists will be unfitted for their task by their tastes and occupations, besides being wholly occupied with the land recovered to their native land the most serious obstacle in all colonisation. Moreover, the military control under which they will be placed, will repress all emulation. Hence, it is probable that the Government will meet with obstacles on which it has not reckoned, and most formidable of all will be the incapacity of the pioneers which it is sending to Guiana.

M. DE CASABIANCA.

AMONG the men whom the success of the President of the French Republic has raised into active political service is M. de Casabianca, who has recently been appointed to the newly-created office of Minister of State.

Xavier de Casabianca, who, with M. Abbattucci, chief of the cabinet of the Minister of Justice, is stated to be a cousin of the President, was born at Bastia about the year 1810, studied for the bar, and practised as an advocate at Ajaccio. He is a decided Bonapartist: he sat in the Leg slative Assembly for Corsica, and passed for a well-informed man; and, unlike many of his political confrères, he is of independent fortune. With Abbattucci, another Corsican supporter, Casabianca has been a confidential adviser of Louis Napoleon. In October last he was appointed Minister of Agriculture and Commerce; the next filled the office of Minister of Finance; and in December was born the decree announcing that a Ministry of State and Finance should exist at M. Casabianca, formerly Minister of Finance, had been appointed Minister of State; one of his earliest duties was the countersigning of a decree containing a plan for regulating official costume, and prepared in the office of the Interior; and the subsequent decrees of the President have borne the notification, "Countersigned, X. de Casabianca."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 13, 1852.

THE French President continues his marvellous career, and panting wonder is unable to keep pace with him. All the smaller liberties that escaped his desperate onslaught on the 2d of December, have one by one been crushed under his iron heel since that time; and with a perseverance and inflexibility which, were they displayed in a good cause, would render him a hero, he which, displayed in a bad cause, make him what language fails to designate—he has allowed nothing to daunt, or even to interrupt him in the establishment of what we suppose must be called his "system." Until within a comparatively recent period his acts have been simply despotic. He has destroyed liberty—invaded the independence of the magistracies placed public education under the control of the Jesuits—and committed a series of public robberies almost without condescending to explain to the bewildered people his reason for the spoliation. But he now appears in a new, and, if possible, in a still more mischievous character. He has exhibited himself not simply as the military dictator, but as the relentless theorist. Undertaking to govern by himself alone, he has allowed no department of public affairs to escape him, and shown by two recent acts that his ideas of social and fiscal economy are perilous in the highest degree to the unhappy country that will have to submit to them. The first and least objectionable of these two acts appears to have been suggested to his mind by the writings of John Law, the originator of the famous Mississippi scheme. Our readers will probably remember an article, intitled "Why France is Dangerous to Herself and to her Neighbours," which appeared in this Journal on the 24th of January last, in which, on the authority of statistical and other documents published in the reign of Louis Philippe and subsequently, it was shown that the vast majority of the proprietors of the French soil possessed small patches of land which they had not capital to cultivate; that these patches were mortgaged to the full extent, at rates of interest ranging from six or seven to ten and fifteen per cent., and averaging eight per cent. Louis Napoleon, impressed with the evils of this state of things, has sought a remedy for it—not in the natural way, by abolishing the law which renders the subdivision of the soil compulsory upon the unhappy people, but by the publication of a decree providing that it shall be lawful for the Government to authorise certain companie to advance money on landed security, at rates of interest not to exceeding five per cent., and with an additional payment of from one to two per cent. in the nature of a sinking fund. These companies are to have the power of issuing "land-notes," or letters of pledge, not exceeding in amount the value of the funds advanced on this species of mortgage. These notes are to be for any amount exceeding 100 francs, payable to bearer. The Government proposes to vote every year a certain sum of money to be advanced on these securities for the present, but not more than fifteen million francs (£400,000), being part of the splendid property of the House of Orleans confiscated by the decree of the 22d of January, is to be devoted to the commencement of the undertaking. The security is to be enforced by a summary process of sequestration and foreclosure. Such is the outline of this scheme, which is intended to relieve peasant proprietors holding land producing three per cent. of liabilities averaging eight per cent. We say nothing of the nefarious spoliation of the Orleans family, which is to provide the means for launching the project, but would simply point attention to the folly of the President in imagining that an unlimited issue of paper money upon such a security as this can ultimately answer any good or safe purpose. The land of France, after allowing the barest possible living of potatoes and black bread, with now and then a bit of horseflesh to the unhappy cultivators, scarcely returns three per cent. The misery of the people must have been great, and their mania for the possession of land still greater, when they have squeezed themselves down into a worse than pauper diet by paying eight per cent. for the privilege of retaining or cultivating the soil. If they can obtain advances at five per cent. by means of the new project of the President, it will no doubt be a temporary alleviation of their misery; but what will be the ultimate result, supposing that this gigantic scheme should act? Simply to transfer the possession of the soil to these new companies, or to the State, at a loss to the nation, and to deprive the pauperised proprietors of the land for which they have made so many sacrifices, and turn them adrift upon the world, without any means of living, not even the unhappy alternative of a Poor-law. And what, we would ask any financier, would be the value of these inconvertible notes of 100 francs, even supposing the issuers to be in full possession of the security on which they were founded? They would experience the fate of railway shares, or any other descriptions of scrip, and, like every thing else that does not pay, suffer a great and, rapid depreciation. Were this scheme carried out to anything like its extent, that would operate as a temporary relief to the distressed proprietors of the soil, it would absorb a vast amount of capital, and derange the whole trade of the country, only in the long run to end in a general prostration of credit.

But the scheme, in consequence of its vastness, and of the positive inability of the State to supply the means to relieve the stupendous indebtedness of French proprietors, and of the disinclination of private capitalists to embark in it, is likely to remain inoperative. The second more notable scheme of the President is more certain to be mischievous; and, unless that personage is stopped in his career, he will, at no distant date, drive the country down the yawning precipice of a national bankruptcy. In spite of the opposition of the Comte d'Argout—a man to whose intimate knowledge of finance, and to whose wise and prudent management of the Bank of France for upwards of fifteen years, that institution owes the high character it enjoys in Europe—the President has issued a decree for regulating the monetary policy of the Bank. The President, by this extraordinary document, has reduced the rate of discount on commercial bills from 4 to 3 per cent.; has ordered the Bank to make advances on railway shares and debentures; has postponed for fifteen years the payment of a debt of 75,000,000 francs borrowed from the Bank by the Provisional Government in 1848, under a solemn promise of repayment within a twelvemonth; has reduced the rate of interest upon it from 4 to 3 per cent.; and, as a climax, has abolished the wholesome obligation on the Bank of publishing weekly statements of its assets and liabilities, and substituted quarterly and half-yearly abstracts in their stead. What the next act of the President will be, surpasses human ingenuity to imagine. The world was pretty well alarmed and astonished at the deeds of the Provisional Government; but M. Ledru Rollin and his colleagues were harmless enthusiasts compared with M. Louis Napoleon.

MEETING OF LIBERAL MEMBERS.—A meeting of the Liberal members of Parliament, who are adherents of the late Government, was held at the residence of Lord John Russell, at Chesham-place, on Thursday, with a view to come to some arrangement as to the Parliamentary tactics to be observed with reference to the Derby Administration. The proceedings were wholly of a private nature, and therefore have not transpired. The Globe, which is regarded as the official organ of the party, however, states that "His Lordship urged upon the meeting the expediency of bringing the Government to an immediate issue on the question of Free Trade. It is understood that Lord John Russell's course was not adopted without previous consultation with the most eminent members of the present Opposition. The noble Lord was received throughout most warmly, and the only discussion arose on the expediency of simultaneously pressing the Cabinet to declare its views on Parliamentary reform." We believe that the prevailing feeling of the meeting was in favour of, in the first instance, concentrating the efforts of the Liberal party on the preservation of Free Trade. We hear that Mr. Villiers will invite the Government to explain their intentions on this momentous subject on Monday evening."

The Earl of Eglinton made his public entry into Dublin on Wednesday, as the Queen's Viceroy in Ireland. The procession of the civic authorities, the military, and the other ceremonies usual on those occasions were gone through with great splendour.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

In the Vice-Chancellor Turner's Court, on Monday, an application for a continuation was made on behalf of Tallis the original publisher of an edition of Shakspeare, to restrain Frederick and Charles Tallis from publishing the same. It appeared that the partnership which existed between the plaintiff and Frederick Tallis at the time when certain stereotype plates had been purchased for the edition of Shakspeare had been dissolved, when the defendant Frederick entered into a covenant with the plaintiff not to use or exercise what was called the canvassing trade of a publisher within the City of London, or certain distances thereof. The publication in question was brought out by Charles Tallis, the other defendant, who it was alleged only acted as agent to Frederick Tallis. The Vice-Chancellor said he was by no means sure what the rights of the parties were such a covenant as the one in question. He should direct the motion to stand over, with liberty to the plaintiff to bring an action; that he thought the proper course was to take, and, if the defendant Frederick was doing indirectly that which he covenanted not to do directly, the Court would interfere.

At Winchester, on Saturday, a curious case of libel was tried before Mr Justice Talfourd. It was a proceeding by way of indictment, brought by Lieut Rainier, R.N., against Miss Newhouse, of Carshalton, in the Isle of Wight, who was step-sister to his wife. The facts, as elicited by an inquiry which lasted upwards of thirteen hours, were briefly these:—Lieut. Rainier married the youngest daughter of the late Colonel Newhouse in 1839; they lived together till November, 1851, when Lieut. Rainier, acting on medical advice, placed his wife in Grove-place Lunatic Asylum. As soon as this was known to the defendant, she wrote a letter to the head physician of the asylum, in which she asserted, in the strongest and most unmistakeable terms, that Lieutenant Rainier was the cause of his wife's lunacy; in which, however, the defendant expressed her disbelief so far, that it was unnecessary for her step-sister to be confined. This was the libel complained of, and it was stated at the outset that the prosecutor did not seek punishment of the defendant, but only to clear his own character, and counsel offered to let a verdict pass of not guilty if the other side would admit that the letter was written under a mistaken impression. Mr. Justice Talfourd strongly recommended this course; but defendant declined, and joined issue on two grounds—first, that the letter was a privileged and confidential communication; and, secondly, that there was a justification. Evidence was then tendered to show that Lieutenant Rainier had treated his wife improperly, had used violence towards her, had refused to let her enjoy the company of her relatives, &c. The defendant and others, it was asserted, were anxious to get rid of her from his home. On the other hand it was proved that Mrs. Rainier had acted as if of unsound mind; she had illusions that Mr. Darnell Sir James Graham, Mr. Douglas Jerrold, and Sir E. Bulwer Lytton were sons and some plot concerning various opening letters addressed by her to a young friend at Cowes. The alleged lunatic herself was brought by habeas corpus to be examined, and gave her evidence in a collected, rational, and connected manner. By direction of his Lordship, a verdict was taken for the defendant on the first issue, and for the Crown on the second, the pleas of justification not being made out.

The two magistrates of the metropolitan police-courts have been much perplexed within the last few days in consequence of an attempt being made to involve them in a suit at present pending in the Court of Chancery, arising out of the following facts. A gentleman of the name of Thompson, who had been a purser in the navy, bequeathed a considerable legacy to the several magistrates presiding at nine different metropolitan police-courts, for the benefit of the poor frequenting their respective districts. Messrs. Winter, Hammans, and Co., the solicitors in the case, have filed a bill in the Vice-Chancellor's Court, calling upon the different persons mentioned in the will to come forward and state the grounds upon which they claimed to be entitled.

A BENEDICT.—At the Clerkenwell Police-office, on Wednesday, a young man applied to Mr. Corrie in the following terms:—"Please your worship I wish to know whether it is lawful for a man to marry his own aunt?" (A loud laugh.) Mr. Corrie (smiling):—It is a most extraordinary question. Have you married your aunt? Applicant: Yes, my mother's sister. (Laughter.) Mr. Corrie: How old are you? Applicant: Nineteen. Mr. Corrie: And what age is your aunt? Applicant: Twenty. Mr. Corrie said that such a marriage was certainly illegal according to the Scriptures, and he referred to Leviticus and the Common Prayer-book. The wife, a good-looking young woman, here said: He's a fool, and I'm going to do nothing to make him comfortable. Applicant: I can't live with her, she has got such a bad temper. Wife: If the marriage is illegal, and he leaves me, is he not bound to support me? Mr. Corrie: (A pause.) Then you married your aunt? Mr. Corrie: Yes. Mr. Corrie: Well, I will do so? Mr. Corrie: Yes. Wife: Oh, then, that's all right. (Laughter.) Applicant: I'll take good care I'll not get married again. I have had enough of it for the last six months. (Loud laughter.) The applicant then left the court, followed by his aunt wife, who continued abusing her nephew until they got out of sight.

At Bow-street Police-office, on Wednesday, Richard Mendy, a driver of one of the Pimlico omnibuses, was committed for two months to hard labour, and in addition to have his licence revoked, for driving through the Strand in a furious manner, and thereby endangering the lives of passengers. It appeared in evidence, that on the previous evening, the prisoner was observed racing and edging with a Westminster omnibus. When they had arrived opposite Bedford-street, in the Strand, the Pimlico vehicle came in contact with a coal-cart, and the consequence was that the former was rent asunder, the fore-part being dashed to pieces, while the tinder-part was left about 20 yards distant, resting on the wheels. There happened to be only two male passengers inside, who escaped miraculously without any material injury.

COUNTRY NEWS.

THE MARQUIS OF BATH.—On Monday week a grand banquet was given by the Marquis of Bath to his tenantry, on the occasion of his coming of age, at Longleat House, near Frome, Wiltshire, when nearly 200 of the most influential resident gentry sat down to a magnificent dinner, served by Messrs. Gunter, of Berkeley-square, London.

FREEMASONRY.—On Wednesday, Sir W. W. Wynn, Bart., was duly installed Grand Master for the province of Shropshire and North Wales, by Brother Viscount Combermere, K.C.B.

The Derby Mercury states that Mr. W. Blandy, of Chesterfield, who recently resigned the office of minister of the Independent Chapel at Chesterfield, is about to become minister of the Established Church.

THE PORT OF SOUTHAMPTON.—The managing director of the Cape of Good Hope Mail Screw Steam packet Company has been visiting Southampton this week, to inquire into the capabilities of that port as a packet-station. It appears now to be a settled matter, that, if the screw mail-packets for Australia, the Cape, or the west coast of Africa take in cargo in London, they will take in mails at Plymouth. If, however, it can be rendered convenient for these packets to take in cargo at Southampton, and avoid the delay, danger, and expense of going to the Thames, then the mails conveyed by these packets will be taken in at Southampton also.

A singular discovery of subterranean caverns has been made under a stone quarry at Telford Evins, near Chirmark, in the county of Wilts.

THE HOLMFIRTH CATASTROPHE.—The following is a list of subscriptions for the sufferers by the Holmfirth catastrophe up to day (Saturday). The total amount subscribed is £47 690:—Huddersfield, £5,000; Liverpool, £2800; Holmfirth, £4000; Leeds, £5750; Manchester, £2800; Halifax, £4000; Bradford, £3200; York, £2100; Wakefield, £350; Liverpool, £400; Barnsley, £500; Sheffield, £600; Birmingham, £500; Scarborough, £200; Rochdale, £300; [illegible], £300; Hull, £450; Ashton, £450; Preston, £300.

PERILOUS STATE OF THE HOLME STYES RESERVOIR.—On Friday week a numerous meeting of the inhabitants of Holmfirth and the neighborhood was held in the Town Hall, for the purpose of consulting with regard to the Holme Styes Reservoir. The hall was densely crowded in every part, the great body of the assembly being appareled of the operative class. Among the gentlemen present we observed Joseph Charlesworth, Esq., of P. J. Josh. Marsden, Esq., J.P. (reservoir commissioner), Rev. R. B. Lash, incumbent of Holmfirth; Rev. James Macfarlane, independent minister; James Charlesworth, Esq.; Messrs. Joseph, T. Garbutt, David Hinchliffe (a reservoir commissioner), besides a number of gentlemen from several of the places adjacent. Mr. Joseph Charlesworth was called to the chair. The following petition to the House of Commons was then moved by Mr. T. Garbutt, and seconded by Mr. Hinchliffe (a reservoir commissioner), besides a number of gentlemen from several of the places adjacent. Mr. Joseph Charlesworth was called to the chair. The following petition to the House of Commons was then moved by Mr. T. Garbutt, and seconded by Mr. Hinchliffe (a reservoir commissioner), praying for relief against the oppressive fears of your petitioners, by immediately appointing that such measures may be carried into effect as will render the Holme Styes Reservoir no longer a source of reasonable apprehension; and that it please your honourable House to amend the law with regard to the responsibility of the commissioners of such reservoirs, so that when guilt attaches to them in fact, it may at the same time be legally recognised."

FIRE AND EXPLOSION AT A TAR FACTORY.—On Tuesday morning, shortly before eight o'clock, an explosion and fire of a serious character took place at the premises belonging to Messrs. Samuel Dorset, naphtha and tar manufacturer, situate on the brink of Raven's Bond Creek, Deptford. The premises were soon in a blaze, and the stock in trade became ignited, and ran like liquid fire over the ground, and having entered the creek, a large tar barge nearly consumed before it was scuttled; as it was, one side of the vessel was extensively scorched. Such was the force of the explosion, that a heavy steam boiler, eight feet wide, was lifted from its original position and thrown over a high fence built, and one of the workmen was so seriously injured by the hot liquid as to be obliged to be removed to the hospital. By the time the engines had arrived every portion of the building in which the misfortune commenced was wrapped in flame, consequently not the least chance remained of saving any of the contents. Unfortunately the sufferer was not insured.

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT.—At Hatherleigh, on Friday evening week, a fire broke out in a small farm-house called Prescott, which destroyed the [illegible] and burnt to death two children and two pigs belonging to a shoemaker of the name of Slade. It is supposed that the fire was [illegible] who were at the time alone in the house.

EXPLOSION OF FIRE-DAMP.—A serious explosion of fire-damp occurred on the morning of Friday week, at Birchwood Colliery, near Alfreton; doing great injury to the works, and endangering the lives of the whole body of colliers present on the occasion (45 in number), some of whom, it is believed, will not survive the extensive injuries they have received from the burning gas. The report of the explosion was heard a considerable distance from Birchwood, and such was its force, that corves, pieces of coal, and rubbish were blown out of the pit with great violence.

THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

LOBBY OF THE NEW HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Our Illustrations this week of the new Palace at Westminster consist of a representation of the beautiful Lobby to the House of Commons, two statues—one from the Victoria Tower, and the other one of the series of Magna Charta Barons, for the niches in the House of Lords, and a chandelier from one of the corridors. The Lobby is a very fine apartment, square in plan, about 45 feet each way, and having a doorway in each side. It forms the chief vestibule to the House of Commons, and by a short corridor communicates with the great octagonal hall in the centre of the Palace, and this, in fact, forms the only entrance for the public to the Lobby. Each side of the Lobby is alike in its general features, being divided into three equal parts—the central portion containing a deeply recessed and lofty doorway, and the others being divided into two stories. The lower of these are used as offices connected with the House—such as the vote office, post-office, &c.; and in the upper stories, on the east, west, and south sides, are windows filled with stained glass, and on the north side the tracery of the windows is continued, the plane surface of the wall being painted to represent coloured glass. Underneath the windows, on a frieze, on each wall, is sculptured the following legend:—"Domine salvam fac Reginam, nostram Victoriam." The divisions of the walls are marked by bold projections, the lower parts being deeply-paneled buttresses, whence rise columns, their capitals serving as corbels to carry the main ribs, of richly-carved oak, which divide the ceiling into nine parts, and having four massive pendants at their junctions. The ceiling itself is flat, and the principal divisions are each subdivided into four parts; and these are again divided into four parts by lesser ribs, and at their intersections are extremely rich and varied bosses. Pedestals for statues are at each of the divisions on the walls. The entrance door to the House of Commons, which is the one represented in the centre of our Engraving, on the north side, is much more elaborate in its ornamental details than the others, and the finish and execution of these enrichments are particularly fine. Above each great arch the walls are pierced with five arches, having quatrefoils in their spandrils, and in traceried panels beneath them are shields. The door on the east side leads to a corridor communicating with the Commons' refreshment-rooms, libraries, &c.; and by the western door the members of the House usually enter, as it opens into the upper cloister and the staircase set apart for the members. The floor of the House Lobby is laid with Minton's encaustic tiles, in rich patterns; and there are narrow borders of black marble crossing from side to side of the lobby, and inclosing tiles with these appropriate inscriptions, in Gothic characters, white on a blue ground, "Without counsell the people fall;" "In the multitude of counsellors is safety;" and "Fear God, honour the Queen."

The Lobby is lighted by gas jets issuing from standards of very fine design in each corner of the apartment; but, as we shall illustrate them in a future Number, we shall now only point them out as being shown on a small scale, in our present View. They are of Hardman's manufacture. The stained windows are a continuation of the series of municipal armorial bearings, a portion of which adorn the windows of the House of Commons: these also are by Hardman.

The Chandelier we represent, is a beautiful example of wrought-work in brass, and is especially noticeable for its very elegant design. In the finish and minuteness of all the details, the workmanship is exquisite. It is selected from the chandeliers which light the corridors from the lobbies of both Houses of Parliament.

In describing the Royal entrance in the Victoria Tower, we mentioned the fine character of the ornamental details of the architectural enrichments, and also the figures of the Queen, attended by Justice and Mercy, and the statues of the patron saints of the United Kingdom. We now give a representation of one of these, the knightly figure of St. George, which is admirable as a figure, picturesque in its attitude, and effective in all its details. The whole of the statuesque and architectural enrichments of the Victoria entrance, we should have mentioned, are due to the taste and skill of Mr. John Thomas, and evince great fertility and appositeness of design.

The statue of Geoffrey de Mandeville, Earl of Gloucester, A.D. 1215, the subject of our other Illustration, is one of the series of eighteen intended for the niches between the windows in the House of Lords. It was modelled by Mr. J. Sherwood Westmacott at Rome, and is a very effective and pleasing statue in mailed armour, the minutiæ of the costume being excellently carried out. The head of the stout Earl is, of course, imaginary, as no portraits exist of the great Barons who forced Magna Charta upon King John. The statue was cast in electro-bronze by Messrs. Elkington, and is most exquisitely finished in every part: it is, perhaps, one of the finest pieces of electro casting ever executed.

LITERARY FORGERIES.

The Shelley Letters, published by Mr. Moxon, and reviewed in our paper a fortnight since, are, it turns out, with but one or two exceptions, forgeries. It is proper to say at once that Mr. Moxon has been deceived, and that no gentleman from the moment of the discovery could have acted more straightforwardly and promptly than he has done in this transaction. As soon as he was convinced that he had been the means (the innocent means) of giving to the public a false article, he did his best to repair his mistake. He has suppressed the book, and he has called in the copies delivered to the trade.

The discovery was made in quite an accidental manner. Mr. Moxon had sen a copy of the book to Mr. Tennyson. During a visit which Mr. Palgrave was paying to Mr. Tennyson he dipped into the Shelley volume, and lighted on a letter written from Florence to Godwin—the better half of which he at once recognised as part of an article on Florence written for the Quarterly Review so far back as 1840, by his father, Sir Francis Palgrave. It is good to find a son so well versed in the writing of his father as young Mr. Palgrave proved himself to be on this occasion. He lost no time, as we may suppose, in communicating his curious discovery to his father; and Sir Francis, after comparing the printed letter with the printed article, wrote at once to Mr. Moxon, informing him that the letter—by whomsoever written—was a "crib" from an article which he had written for the Quarterly Review.

Startled at such intelligence, Mr. Moxon replied that he had bought the letter at a public sale among other letters, also by Shelley, and that the passage o which Sir Francis claimed the authorship was contained in a letter written by Shelley, carrying upon it the post-mark of the period and other written signs which apparently marked it to be genuine. The Deputy-Keeper of the Public Records was, it may be readily imagined, equally startled with Mr. Moxon at the announcement of such a fact. He wanted to see the letter. The letter was produced. "It looks genuine; is it not genuine?" "I am the author of that passage, but not the writer of that letter," was the reply of Sir Francis. "But may not Sir Francis," it was urged by Mr. Moxon, "have seen this letter in the noble collection of autographs belonging to his father-in-law, Mr. Dawson Turner?" a question which only added a fresh difficulty to the solution sought.

In this emergency Mr. Moxon had recourse to the assistance of a gentleman known to be conversant with autographs. The letters were placed in his hands with a request that he would spare no pains to ascertain the truth about them, and with this information to guide him—that they had been shown to some

EXHIBITION OF THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.—"SPRING." PAINTED BY SIDNEY R. PERCY.

Post-office clerks at the General Post-office, who, "to the best of their belief pronounced them to be genuine.

The first step taken after this was to compare the postmarks with Byrons letters to Mr. Murray, posted from the same cities in the same month and year, and to the same city—London. Here they failed, and in this way:—Where "Ravenna" on a genuine letter was in a small sharp type, in the Shelley letter it was in a large uncertain type; and in the letters from Venice, the post-mark of the City of Palaces was stamped in an Italic, and not, as on the Shelley specimens, in a Roman letter! These were strong facts; but then the dates agreed with Shelley's sojourn at the several places—the seals were correct. The hand-writing was marvellously Shelley-like—no hesitation about it—a free accustomed hand. "Are they not genuine?"

From whom did Mr. Moxon buy these letters? They were bought at Sotheby and Wilkinson's, at large prices. From whom did Messrs. Sotheby and Wilkinson receive them for sale? "We had them from Mr. White, the bookseller in Fall-Mall, over against the Reform Club." Off runs the gentleman-detective. "From whom did you, Mr. White, obtain these letters?" "I bought them of two women; I believed them to be genuine, and I paid large prices for them in that belief." Such are the words supposed to have been spoken by Mr. White. The two women would appear to have been like the man in a clergyman's band, but a lawyer's gown, who brought Pope's letter to Curll.

It would be impolitic at this stage of an important inquiry to publish the whole of the particulars placed at our service in elucidation of the forgery of these letters. It is proper, however, to say thus early that there has been of late years, as we are assured, a most systematic and wholesale forgery of letters purporting to be written by Byron, Shelley, and Keats—that these forgeries carry upon them such marks of genuineness as have deceived the entire body of London collectors—that they are executed with a skill to which the forgeries of Chatterton and Ireland can lay no claim that they have sold at public auctions and by the hands of booksellers, to collectors of experience and rank, and that the imposition hes extended to a large collection of books, bearing not only the signature of Lord Byron, but notes by him in many of their pages, the matter of the letters being selected with a thorough knowledge of Byron's life and feelings, and the whole of the books chosen with the minutest knowledge of his tastes and peculiarities.

But the "marvel" of the forgery is not yet told. At the same sale at which Mr. Moxon bought the Shelley letters, were catalogued for sale a series of (unpublished) letters from Shelley to his wife, revealing the innermost secrets of his heart, and containing facts, not wholly dishonourable facts to a father's memory, but such as a son would wish to conceal. These letters were bought in by the son of Shelley, the present Sir Percy Shelley, and are now proved, we are told, to be forgeries. To impose on the credulity of a collector is a minor offence, compared with the crime of forging evidence against the dead, and still minor as in one instance against the fidelity of a woman.

The forgery of Chatterton injured no one but an imaginary priest; the forgery of Ireland made a great poet seem to write worse than Settle could have written; but this forgery blackens the character of a great man, and, worse still, tradnces female virtue.

Mr. Moxon is not the only publisher taken in. Mr. Murray has been a heavy sufferer, though not to the same extent. Mr. Moxon has printed his Shelley purchases; Mr. Murray wise through Mr. Moxon's example—will not publish his Byron acquisitions.—Athenæum.

SALLYPORT OF WINDSOR CASTLE, JUST DISCOVERED.

EXHIBITION OF THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

We this week engrave one of Mr. Sidney Percy's two pictures—"Spring," a woodland scene, with some felled timber lying in a remarkably bold manner across the picture. It is all painted with great clearness and crispness of outline, under a broad, bright, but cold sky. We fancy we feel our teeth chattering in the north-east wind as we look at it. Nevertheless, it is a clever picture, and, when mellowed down by time, or a little judicious glazing, would not be a disagreeable one in a warm room.

DISCOVERY OF THE SALLYPORT OF WINDSOR CASTLE.

Extensive improvements have for several months past been in progress at Windsor Castle under the direction of her Majesty's Commissioners of Woods and Forests, who, after a period of 28 years from the commencement of negotiations, have succeeded in completing the purchase of all the houses on the Castle side of Thames-street between Henry VIII.'s Gateway, on Castle-hill, and the bottom of the Hundred Steps. These houses have been removed; the street is widened and much improved; and the most ancient part of the Castle now abuts on the town, towering majestically above the buildings which surround it, carrying the mind's eye back to the age when the first huts of Windsor were raised beneath its walls for shelter and security.

A few days since, the workmen in levelling the ground between the Garter Tower and the old Belfry Tower, known as Julius Cæsar's Tower, discovered, at about six feet below the surface, a passage cut through the chalk rock on which the Castle is built. The filth and rubbish being got out, the passage proved to be six feet wide and ten feet high; the sides are built of sound masonry, and it is arched over with massive stonework. At present it has been traced to one of the Minor Canons' houses in the Horseshoe Cloisters, adjoining Julius Cæsar's Tower, where the entrance is bricked up. From this part there is a gradual descent into Thames-street; thence it appears to pass under the houses in the direction of the river Thames, but this part has not yet been explored. Hundreds of persons have already descended into the passage; and, to assist the more curious to penetrate into the furthest portion, a person has been stationed on the spot with candles.

It is conjectured that this is the ancient Sallyport from the Castle made as a means of escape in case of siege or invasion, and that it passes under the river to Burnham Abbey, which is about three miles distant, where there is a corresponding passage proceeding in the direct line to Windsor. It is expected that, if the excavat on is further traced from beneath the cloisters, this passage will be found to communicate with one in the quadrangle of the Castle, which, it will be remembered, was discovered a few years ago to lead under the eastern part of the Castle, in the direction of Old Windsor, and in all probability to the Palace of the Saxon Kings at Old Windsor, where Edward the Confessor occasionally kept his court; but it is a distinct parish, about two miles south-east of New Windsor. This ancient palace was occupied by William the Conqueror at the time when he built Windsor Castle, it is doubtful whether as a mere hunting-lodge or a military post; according to Domesday Book, it was completed in 1086.

It is very remarkable, that, although history furnishes indisputable proof of there being a castle at Old Windsor, and of its being occupied by Saxon Princes as well as by the Conqueror, there are to be found no traces of it at the present day, although Roman roads have been discovered, and Saxon urns dug up, within a short distance of that neighborhood.

It is hoped that the Dean and Canons of Windsor, or the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, will continue the exploration of the extraordinary passage at the Castle, which has created so much interest among the various who have already visited it.

The number of steps at present found are, from the bell-tower, from which they lead to the landing on the turn, forty-four; from thence fourteen to the opening now made, and which we show in our Illustration. It is about six feet below the surface of the earth.

ELECTION INTELLIGENCE.

RE ELECTIONS.

All the vacancies created in the Parliamentary representation of the country by the late change of Ministry have been filled up by the re-election of the former members, with the exception of that of East Retford, the writ for which, by an oversight, was not issued along with the rest. Consequently, Lord Galway, the late member, who has accepted the office of one of the Lords-in-Waiting, has not yet been re-elected. There is no opposition, however, to the return of the noble Lord, and his re-election will take place in a few days.

The re election of Lord Naas (the new Secretary for Ireland) for the county of Kildare has not yet been notified; and although from the strong support obtained by Mr. Cogan, there is a general impression that the noble Lord will not be returned, or, if returned, it will be by a very narrow majority.

The presumed proximity of a general election continues to draw out addresses to the various constituencies of the country, both from existing members and from new candidates.

REPRESENTATION OF THE CITY OF LONDON.—It is the intention of Alderman Sidney to present himself as a candidate for the representation of the City upon the dissolution of Parliament. The friends of the Alderman, who have advised him to this step, ground his claims to the suffrages of his fellow-citizens generally upon his principles of Liberal Conservatism, and his steady support of Free-Trade, and particularly upon the zeal and perseverance of his labours in obtaining on behalf of the City funds £4800 per annum, the cost of the maintenance of convicted prisoners, and the expenses attendant upon criminal prosecutions, as well as in pressing to an advantageous result the investigation into charities as regards the City parishes.

BOLTON.—Sir Joshua Walmsley having declined to come forward again for this borough, Mr. Peter Ainsworth, who represented it previous to 1847, issued on Monday an address to the opponents of the electors, again offering himself as a candidate on the Liberal interest

BURY.—Viscount Duncan, who is now member for the city of Bath, has come forward as a candidate for the suffrages of the electors of Bury at the next election. In his address his Lordship declares himself in favour of suffrage extension, of the ballot, and of short Parliaments; and he refers to his career as member of Parliament as sufficient proof that he is a free-trader and an advocate of financial reform.

CHATHAM.—Within the last few days, Sir Frederick Smith, the late command ing engineer at this garrison, has been soliciting the suffrages of the electors of this borough, as a candidate to represent them in Parliament at the next general election.

DENBIGHSHIRE.—The Chester Courant announces on authority that Mr. Bagot will offer himself for re-election for this county, in conjunction with Sir W. W. Wynn, as a supporter of Lord Derby's Administration.

DUNDALK.—Mr. Thomas M'Quiston, the present member for this borough, is to offer himself again at the general election. An opposition has been threatened by the Orange and Protectionist party, combined with some ultras of the Democratic class.

EAST GLOUCESTER.—There are rumours that, in the event of the retirement of the Duke of Beaufort, the Marquis of Worcester will retire from the representation of this division of the county, and that Mr. Philip W. S. Ayrton will present himself Protectionist member for Bristol, will be brought forward to supply his place

GREAT YARMOUTH.—The re-election of the present members, Messrs. Sandars and Rumbold, is said to be certain. Mr. Edward Lacon Lacon, the railway contractor, and partner of Mr. Peto, M.P., is likely to be brought forward on the Liberal interest to contest the representation. Sir Edward Lacon and Mr. W. H. Windham have also been named as candidates.

HEREFORDSHIRE.—Mr. Reg and Mr. Hanbury, the new candidates for this county in the Protectionist interest, are busily canvassing the county together. At Ross and Ledbury they met with much opposition. At the former place, on Thursday week, were grossly insulted. At Ledbury they were followed from door to door by a mob armed with a piece of meat enveloped in crape, and elevated on the top of a pole. Another man had a diminutive loaf on the end of a stick, which he pertinaciously carried before the candidates

LEEDS.—Sir G Goodman has signified his compliance with the invitation given to him. Mr. J. G. Marshall has declared that the state of his health rendered it imperative on him to retire from Parliamentary life. Thus at present there is only one Liberal candidate before the borough, as Mr Carbutt declines to allow his name to be again proposed. The Liberals have consequently been on the look-out for another candidate, and the name at present mentioned with most favour is that of the Right Hon. Matthew Talbot Baines, late President of the Poor-law Board, and one of the representatives for Hull.

LINCOLN CITY.—It is stated that Lord Arundel's re election is pretty certain; but there will be a formidable struggle for the other seat. A new English candidate is spoken of for this city.

LINCOLN.—Mr. J. Sibthorp, it is stated, will again appeal on Liberal principles to the constituency, and with every prospect of success. Colonel Sibthorp, of course, will stand; and a requisition is in course of signature to Sir E. Bulwer Lytton.

SCARBOROUGH.—The Earl of Mulgrave, eldest son of the Marquis of Normanby, who was defeated at the last election for this borough by Mr. G. F. Young, has announced his intention to stand for the representation at the next dissolution. Mr. Young will retire, and solicit the representation of Cambridgeshire.

SOUTH NORTHUMBERLAND.—Mr. W. B. Beaumont and Mr. S. Ogle are announced as candidates for the representation of this division.

SOUTH SHIELDS.—Mr. Wawn has intimated his resignation of South Shields; and Mr. Ingham has consented to stand on Free-Trade principles. The Hon. A. Liddell is the only other candidate mentioned.

TYNEMOUTH.—Mr. R. W. Grey, the present member, has issued an address to his constituents, in anticipation of an early dissolution. Hugh Taylor, Esq., of the Gold Exchange, London, has intimated his intention of coming forward for Tynemouth in the Conservative interest.

WAKEFIELD.—Mr. George Sandars will again offer himself as a candidate for Wakefield.

A meeting of delegates from factory operatives was held at the Cotton Tree Inn, Manchester, on Sunday, for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of requesting the Legislature to insert the words "no child" in the Act of 1850. Mr. P. Hargreaves presided, and there were twenty-six delegates present, including seven from different branches in Manchester.

A meeting was held on Tuesday, at the Dublin Mansion-house, convened by the Lord Mayor, at the request of a deputation from the committee of the Munster Exhibition, with a view of bringing before the meeting the characteristics of that city the utility of the undertaking, and to consider the best means of promoting its success. Sir Robert Kane, President of the Cork College, addressed the meeting at some length, as did also the Hon. P. J. Vereker. A local committee was formed, and a subscription list was opened.

THE GREAT EXHIBITION.—The Royal Commissioners not having the power under the charter by which they were appointed to dispose of the surplus funds arising from the receipts connected with the Great Exhibition, have applied to Parliament for the necessary authority to enable them to dispose of them. A supplemental charter has therefore been issued.

CITY SEWERS EXPENDITURE.—From a statement of the accounts of the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London, for the year between Michaelmas, 1850, and Michaelmas, 1851, it appears, that, on the consolidated account and sewers account together, their revenue amounted to £74,977 11s. 4d., and their expenditure comprised the following items:—For paving streets, £19 879 7s. 6d.; for lighting lamps, £6,619 19s. 6d.; for cleansing streets, £5654 11s.; for salaries, wages of workmen employed, collection, commission, &c., £7887 19s. 10d.; improvements in widening streets, &c., £2233 9s. 10d.; for sanitary works, £4,493 8s. 6d.; for new sewers and drains, £3719 0s. 4d.; for annuities on life, paying off an old debt, £2444 10s; for various works, £19o3 19s. 7d.; for cleansing and repairing sewers, £8128 10s. 6d.; to parliamentary expenses and law charges, £4177 17s. 2d.; for rents and taxes, £348 3s. 8d.; for sundries, £773 4s. 9d.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—Sir John Boileau presided at the weekly meeting of the society on Wednesday evening, when Professor Wilson read a paper on the economic products and resources of the Great Exhibition. He first alluded to a specimen of cotton extracted from sea-water. He considered the discovery made and carried into effect on the shores of the Mediterranean, near Marseilles, for the extraction of soda from sea-water, might come to be exceedingly valuable to the farmer. The hybridising of the cereals was also of importance to the agriculturist. The lecturer then alluded to the manufacture of beet-root sugar, which might be carried on with profit in this country, seeing that we had the matured experience of Continental manufacturers to guide us. The use of rapeseed oil in the lubrication of machinery was also a matter of considerable importance, and would become increasingly important as machinery came to be more and more extensive-y used. Messrs Brotherton who exhibited a number of specimens of tea oil at the Crystal Palace, compared that obtained from British seed with that produced from foreign ones. The London and North-Western Company alone consumed about 30 000 gallons of oil in a year. At five quarters to an acre, it would require the rand acres of rapeseed to produce oil sufficient for that company alone Professor Wilson then alluded to the reaping machines of M'Cormack and Hussey, especially praised that of Mr. Bell, of the Carse of Gowrie, invented as far back as 1839. It cut about twelve acres per day, at a cost of 3s. 6d. per acre, and was even capable of cutting eighteen acres per day. However, he considered that in many of the old machines, which were new neglected, in which there were refactory motion and general propulsion, there were the elements of a much more reaping machine than any yet brought into operation. At the close of the lecture a vote of thanks was unanimo s y awarded to him for his able paper.

ROYAL ORTHOPŒDIC HOSPITAL FOR THE CURE OF CLUB FOOT, &c.—On Wednesday a meeting of the friends of the charity was held at the institution in Bloomsbury-square. The hospital was established in 1839, for the cure of all kinds of contractions and deformities, and since that period upwards of 12,000 poor cripples have had the use of their limbs restored to them. During the past year nearly 1500 were admitted to the benefits of the charity, and about 300 names, whose cases will not admit of out-door treatment, are on the books, waiting their turn of admission into the wards. The expenditure in the course of the last year amounted to £2237 16s. 1d.; and the income for the same time being £2418 10s. 8d., there remained a balance in favour of the charity of £180 14s. 7d. It was stated that the 12th of May had been fixed for the anniversary dinner at the Albion Tavern, on which occasion the Earl of Shaftesbury had consented to preside.

ROYAL LITERARY FUND.—The annual general meeting of this corporation was held on Wednesday; Sir Gore Ouseley, Bart. in the chair. The report stated that the sum of £1635 was distributed during the past year in relief to distressed authors and their families, making the tota. sum so applied, from the commencement, £40,305. The receipts of the year, including the annual subscription of the president; the vice-presidents, council, and officers were re-elected, Charles Baldwin, Esq., being elected to the vacant office of treasurer; and Bolton Corney, Esq., to that of auditor. The anniversary dinner was appointed to take place on the 14th of May, when Lord Campbell is expected to preside.

MANSION HOUSE.—On Wednesday the Lord Mayor entertained the Master, Wardens, and Court of Assistants of the Upholders' (the Lordship's) Company, and a number of his private friends. And on Friday his Lordship received at dinner the chairman and directors of the Kent Waterworks, of which company his Lordship is a director, the sheriffs, the members of the Guildhall committee, the masters of the Spectacle-makers' Company, the master and several members of the Court of the Cordwainers' Company.

ROYAL GENERAL DISPENSARY.—On Wednesday, at a quarterly court of the governors of this dispensary, held at the institution in Bartholomew-close, Mr. John Wood, the treasurer, in the chair—the report of the resident apothecary was read, showing that the number of patients admitted to the benefits of this charity, from the 1st October to the 31st December, 1851, was 4,87. Of these 3,013 were relieved, 831 were relieved, 22 had died, and 1348 were still under cure. The total number of patients admitted during the year 1851 was 12,991. Of these 11,067 had been cured or relieved, and 76 had died. The number of patients who had been under cure during the year was 2041.

ASPHODEL BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.—On Wednesday the second general meeting of the members of this institution was held in the lecture-room, Whitehall-yard; Sir Charles Adam in the chair. From the report of the committee it appeared that a branch of this society had been formed in March, 1852, was 3196, of which number 772 were life members, and 2424 were annual subscribers. The abstract of the accounts for the past year showed that the expenditure of the institution had been £1029 18s.) and that the total income by £56 2s. 10d.; in addition to which, the seasonal taxes—about £45 for the last half-year—had not yet been applied for. The decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, on the question of the insolvent members, was then read, and a motion made on the part of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, had been adverse to the institution, and would occasion an additional annual charge of £100, besides the payment of the costs of the suit.

DRAPERS', SILKMERCERS', &c., INSTITUTION.—The twentieth anniversary dinner of the Drapers', Silkmercers', Lacemen's, Haberdashers', and Hosiers' Benevolent Institution was held on Tuesday night at Freemasons' Tavern; the Right Hon. Sir Peter Laurie in the chair, supported by the Sheriffs of the city of London. It appeared from the report that there is a deficiency of about £600 in the funds of the society, while the sums awarded for the last year is more than in any previous year. There have been entertained seventy-five applications for relief, and a sum of £1613 has been expended on members in need members' widows, or their families. The treasurer announced that the donations of the evening amounted to £874, and that £72 in annual subscriptions had been added to the funds.

ROYAL INSTITUTE OF BRITISH ARCHITECTS.—An ordinary meeting of this society was held on Monday evening, Mr. Donaldson in the chair. Mr. Pownall took the chair. Mr. Donaldson resumed the discussion, which had been adjourned to the present meeting, upon the paper read by that gentleman upon the tomb of Sir Walter de Manny, in Charterhouse Abbey. Mr Donaldson then directed the attention of the meeting to the dilapidated state of the monuments in all of the more ancient edifices in the country. Mr Scott then gave a short account of the group of monuments in the Basilica of St. Lorenzo, Florence, which he stated were the most probably erected by Italian workmen, Glorious and Peter, a citizen of Rome, but whose surname was obliterated. He thought that there ought to be a survey made of all the early ecclesiastical monuments in the kingdom, and engravings or models taken, which might be referred to hereafter in restoring them. The meeting then adjourned.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW.—An adjourned meeting of the above society was held on Monday evening, at their Chambers, Regent-street; Mr. Frederick Hill in the chair. The most prominent portion of the business was the reading, by Mr. Stuart, of a communication from Mr. Hastings, as to the operation of the New York code. The distinguishing feature of that code, to which the learned gentleman drew especial attention, was the manner in which the rights of married women were guarded in America, where it was provided by the code in question, that the real and personal property of married women shall not be at the disposal of the husband unless in certain specified cases, but shall be her sole property, as if she were single female. The code was also ordered to be printed and circulated, and Mr. Hastings then read a report from the comma ttee on the Law School, pointing out various modes of improving the means of study for the profession of the law, and make law their profession. It was agreed that the report should be printed for circulation, and the meeting then adjourned.

TELEGRAPH AT ST. GEORGE'S HOSPITAL.—Dr. Pitman, the zealous physician attached to the hospital, desirous of getting rid of the annoyance occasioned to the patients by the noisy transmission of orders through the different wards (thus, the hall-porter was accustomed to ring a large bell in the hall until it drew all the nurses in the corridors into the centre of the house, in order to be had to give them), requested the assistance of Mr John Braithwaite, the engineer, who visited the hospital, and suggested the manner in which it should be done. In the hall is a screen having in it a dial on each side, which are engraved a number of signals. On the walls of the different wards are corresponding dials similarly engraved, but much larger; and when the pointer to the dial in the hall is moved to any signal, all the other moves in precisely the same way, and at the same time a little hammer falls on a small bell, and draws attention to the fact that the pointer has moved. In this way about fifty signals are transmitted daily in each case, and are found to prevent error of the least kind. The cost in the first instance, we are told, was very trifling, and that of maintenance is really nothing. The same arrangement might be made useful in dwelling-houses for ordinary domestic use.

INCREASE OF BUSINESS AT THE CHIEF POST-OFFICE.—During the last week the business at the General Post-Office has materially increased, in consequence of the great facilities now afforded to publishers of printed books (works of every description), pamphlets, newspapers, maps, &c., and to the acceleration of the delivery, as to the operation of the New York code. The distinguishing feature of that code, to which the learned gentleman drew especial attention, was the manner in which the rights of married women were guarded in America, where it was provided by the code in question, that the real and personal property of married women shall not be at the disposal of the husband unless in certain specified cases, but shall be her sole property, as if she were a single female. THE MEDICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—On Monday the seventy-ninth anniversary of this society was held at the Albion Tavern, Aldersgate-street. The annual oration was delivered by Edward Canton, Esq., F.R.G.S., to a numerous audience; after which the Fothergillian gold medal was awarded to Mr. F Headland, for an essay on a subject proposed by the society; and a silver medal was awarded to Mr Headland (father of the former) for important services rendered by him to the society. The Fellows subsequently dined together.

ASYLUM FOR IDIOTS.—On Wednesday evening the fourth anniversary of the charity was celebrated by a public dinner at the London Tavern, at which about 200 persons were present. The Earl of Carlisle, who presided, was supported by Lord Robert Grosvenor, M.P., Viscount Eclinton, M.P., Colonel M. Fenn, M.P., Mr. Alderman Wire, &c. The report stated that the cases received into the institution exceeded considerably those of last year. There were now 195 patients, comprising altogethers family of 220 persons. In order to carry out a proper satisfaction of the inmates, which was acknowledged matter of primary importance, it has been determined to erect a building of the necessary dimensions to effect that object. The report also stated that—"Twenty-seven new wards during the past summer and autumn months, are casting the use of artificial sounds, and are beginning to speak. Forty-eight have been taught to feed and dress themselves, and to observe cleanly habits Twenty-three have been taught to read, twenty-seven to write, eleven to cipher, a extent to draw Seven are taught music, nearly all singing, nearly all are in the drilling or gymnastic classes Ninety can attend with propriety on domestic, and about fifty on public worship, and have pleasure in so doing." The noble chairman's eloquent appeal on behalf of the charity was nobly responded to by the announcement of subscription amounting to nearly £2000, amongst which were the following:—Baring Brothers, £1000; R. Ellis, Esq., £105; the Earl of Carlisle, £10 10s.; Viscount Eebington, £10 10s., Lord R Grosvenor, £10 10s.; W. Monk, Esq., £21; J. H. Shepherd, Esq., £400; Mrs. E Pol en, £ 65; Rev. D. D. Morell, £.00; the Hon. Emily Eden, £10 10s.; and the Corporation of London, £5.0. In the course of the evening, baskets containing shoes, gloves, stockings, net-work, &c., the handiwork of the poor idiots, were passed round the room, and excited the greatest admiration, as evidencing not only the industrious habits of the patients, but also their extraordinary skill and neatness. The musical arrangements were of a most efficient character.

ANNUAL DINNER INSTITUTE FOR AUTHORS AND ARTISTS.—A new society has just been projected. The object is stated to be, to establish a read artists the advantages arising from extensive co-operation. To effect this object, it is proposed that the institute shall consist of three branches, viz., a protective society, a philanthropic and provident fund, an educational association, and a life assurance department. An organisation of authorship is the ultimate end of the system, and its effect is intended to be the extension of the literary character of society to at least the same degree of consideration as the barrister, the physician, or the clergyman." The teachers of a nation, and the moulders of the national sentiment," say the projectors, "should be cared for as much as those who make and administer its laws"

ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.—On Monday night the usual meeting of the Royal Geographical Society was held at the Royal Institution, Albemarle-street; Sir R. I. Murchison, president, in the chair. Captain Peel, Captain Beaston, Mr. J. W. Prout, and Mr. Bates were elected members. Mr. Grinnell, the President of the United States Geographical Society, who it will be remembered, sent out at his own expense an expedition in search of Sir J. Franklin, had communicated that he had received from her Majesty's Government a despatch from Sir Edward Belcher, dated from the Wellington Channel, giving Admiral Austen a communication announcing that the Russian Government had sent despatches, both open and closed, to the Russian authorities on the Asiatic and American shores, instructing them to give a line aid in their power to the expedition of Captain Penderson. The thanks of the society were voted to the Russian Government for its ready compliance with the wishes of the society in this respect. A short paper by Vice Consul Dixon was then read, on the subject of "The Loyalty Islands." The paper consisted mainly of brief extracts from the journal of Mr. Jones, a friend of the writer, who had been shipwrecked on the island of Lifu, and remained there for two years. The islands are described as being of coral formation, and as being very fertile and well wooded. The inhabitants of the Fejees were stated to be cannibals of the worst description. Mr. Hunt, the Wesleyan missionary at one of the islands, had about 500 persons under his care in five bays within fifteen miles of his residence. When they see a fine man, the manner they make is, "What fine eating he would be." Some of them eat raw human flesh, and it is said to be delicious. Some one cut a piece off a man whilst he was alive, cook it, and then make himself eat it. Yet, combined with these barbarous, cruel, and degrading practices, it appeared that a kind of morality and the laws of good breeding are observed by them. (Laughter.) Some of their customs were very singular. When parents grew old, they were killed by their children. Sometimes they were killed as a sacrifice of thanks to the gods, and on the death of chiefs thousands were killed On some occasions they insisted on being killed, in spite of the entreaties of their children and friends. It was a common custom to cut off a finger as a mark of grief for the loss of a friend, and few people were to be met with who had not lost a finger from this cause. Captain Kellett and Captain Fraser, two of which had visited these islands, confirmed, as far as they were able, what had been the general character of the statements of Mr. Jones and Mr. Hadfield, and of the statements of Archdeacon Wilson, made by Captain Worth. The thanks of the society were given to Captain Worth for his communication.

CITY SLAUGHTER-HOUSES AND COMMON LODGING-HOUSES.—On Saturday last the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London issued a series of rules and regulations respecting slaughter-houses and common lodging-houses, with the view of inducing a better system of ventilation and cleanliness, and thereby preventing the spread of infectious diseases among the neighbourhood. In respect to slaughter-houses, the penalty for a breach of the rules is a fine of not less than ten shillings, and not exceeding forty shillings In respect to the lodging-houses, it is ordered that in each room set apart for the reception of more than one family, a card is to be set up in each room, to state the limits set to the number of occupants thereof. Their number to be proportioned to the cubic contents of the room at the rate of 300 cubic feet, fixing 300 cubic feet as the minimum for an adult. Each such room to be lime-whited once in three months at least. The owner of each house, or his agent or collector, to visit each room at the opposite times to be pressed in it; and that it be generally in good and proper repair. He shall see that the premises generally be in a clean and wholesome condition; that water be sufficiently supplied, and failing either of the two latter conditions, he shall forthwith on any complaint thereof before the Court

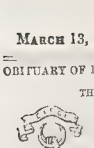
THE PAUPER ESTABLISHMENT AT EDMONTON.—A numerous meeting of the inhabitants of the parish of St. Clement Danes, Strand, Parochial Association, was held in Lancaster-market, on Monday (Mr. Chapman in the chair), when it was resolved by the meeting that the majority of the guardians elected to serve for the year 1851-52 for St. Clement Danes, by reason of their having overturned the entire system of relief at the Union Board, which would have prevented the awful state and condition to which the children and the helpless inmates had been reduced at the Edmonton establishment, and all other evils connected therewith, and in support of the ratepayers of St. Clement Danes; and that the persons present were of opinion that a public meeting should be called at the vestry, and the report relative to the Edmonton establishment, published in the newspapers, brought under the notice of the whole of the parishioners A requisi ion, calling upon the churchwardens of the parish to convene a public meeting on the subject, having been numerously signed, the meeting separated.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—The following is the number of births registered in London during the last week:—Boys, 873; girls, 826: making a total of 1699 registered in London. The deaths for the week were 1128. The deaths in the highest that has occurred during the nine weeks that have elapsed since the 3d of January, and the mean temperature of last week was lower than in any other week during the same period. A comparison of the returns proves that not the young, but persons of advanced years, are the sufferers; for, whereas in the preceding week (ending 28th February) 489 deaths occurred under fifteen years of age, the number of last week, being 485, is only four less; but amongst persons of the age the deaths have increased from 368 to 393; and amongst persons of sixty years and upwards they have risen from 212 to 250. It appears that, while the mortality from the other epidemics has fallen from last two weeks has been nearly stationary, the deaths from diseases of the respiratory organs rose from 193 to 231. Bronchitis was fatal successively to 89 and 121 persons; pneumonia (which, it will be remembered, is generally fatal to the aged) to 67 and 70; and asthma, to 21 and 24; hooping-cough has declined from 47 to 40; phthisis was fatal in the two weeks in 143 and 141 cases. Bronchitis, therefore, has contributed more than any other disease to the increase.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—At the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, the mean daily reading of the barometer was above 30 inches on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday; the mean reading of the week was 30.061 inches. The mean temperature of the week was 30.4 degrees, which is 4 degrees below the average of ten corresponding weeks. The mean daily temperature was below the average on every day of the week; it was 35.2 degrees on Wednesday, or 5.6 degrees below the average; it was 34.8 degrees on Thursday, or 6.1 degrees below the average; and on Friday, when it was lowest, it was 33.9 degrees, which is 7.20 degrees below the average. The wind blew generally from the north and east.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE REV. SIR HARCOURT LEES, BART.



The Rev Sir Harcourt Lees died on the 7th inst., at his seat, Black Rock House, county Dublin. He was second Baronet of the name, and Rector of Killany. The family of Lees is of Scotch origin, descending from Henry Lee, Esq., who, in the reign of James III., married Mary Kirkstar, of the House of Mar.

Sir John Lees, the first Bart., early distinguished himself with the British troops in Germany, under the Marquis of Granby, and subsequently accompanied the Marquis Townshend on his private secretary to Ireland, holding the same appointment under the next Lord-Lieutenant, the Earl of Harcourt. In 1780 he was made Usher of the Black Rod in Ireland; in 1784 became Secretary to the Wardrobe, and in 1793 was established Secretary to the Post-office in Dublin. In 1804 the dignity of a Baronet was conferred upon him. He died in 1811, leaving, with other issue, a son and heir, the late Sir Harcourt Lees, who was born in [illegible]. He was born 20th [illegible] 1781, and succeeded to the title on the death of his father. He married, first, [illegible], daughter of the late Colonel Lyster, of Gallen, county King's County, by whom he has issue, with other children, the present Sir Harcourt Lees, third Baronet.

Sir Harcourt was well known in Ireland for his high Conservative principles.

SIR WILLIAM JACKSON HOMAN, BART.

This venerable Baronet died on the 24 inst., at his seat in the county of Wiltshire, at the advanced age of [illegible]. He was the second son of [illegible] Homan, Esq., of [illegible], county Westmeath, by Elizabeth his wife, [illegible] daughter of the Rev. William Jackson, [illegible]. He was created a Baronet of the United Kingdom, by the title of Sir Jackson Homan, of Barnet, which title becomes extinct, was conferred upon him August 1, 1831.

Sir William Homan married, 28th June, 1797, Lady Charlotte Stuart, second daughter of John first Marquis of Bute, and by her (who is deceased) had issue one son, Philip Stuart George, born in 1802, who died before him.

VICE-ADMIRAL SIR WILLIAM AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE, KNT., K.C.H., G.B.

The death of Sir William occurred on the 6 h inst. This gallant officer entered the Royal Navy in 1796 and saw a good deal of service [illegible] In 1805, when Captain, he commanded the naval brigade at the capture of the Isle of France, his seat and ere rious conduct on the warm occasion [illegible] Admiral of the Blue, and in 1841 Vice-Admiral of the White. He attained that rank in 1846, and was made Vice-Admiral of the United Kingdom in 1851. Sir William married, in 1793, Anne, third daughter of the late Sir George William Leeds, Bart., of Croxton Park, Cambridgeshire.

MAJOR WILMOT.

This praiseworthy British officer, who has just found a premature death in the dreadful Kaffir warfare, was a younger son of the house of Wilmot, of Berkswell Hall, Warwickshire, a family that has ever been honourably active in various departments of the public service. His great-grandfather was Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and twice refused the great seat as Lord Chancellor, with a peerage; his grandfather was a Master in Chancery; an father was Governor of Van Diemen's Land, and his sister Joanna Chief Justice of the battle we been recorded. The present and second Baronet of the family, is a barrister in practice on the Midland Circuit, and a legal writer of repute. Major Henry Robert Wilmot, was the fifth son of the late Sir John Eardley Eardley Wilmot, Bart., Governor of Van Diemen's Land, by his first wife, Elizabeth Emma, daughter of Dr. Parry, of Bath. Having quitted the army early, Mr. Wilmot was a Major in the artillery when he went to the scene of war at the Cape. In was there Commander of Fort Peddar, and proved himself an officer of much ability and fearlessness. He was shot in death on last New Year's Day, while leading his men in an attack upon the enemy in the jungle of the Kie River, where it was reported Sandil was sheltering. This daring leader in his time of the brave M [illegible] adds another and not a small claim which Sir Wilmots have on the grateful feelings of the public.

A Memoir, with a Portrait, will appear next week of Marmont Duke of Ragusa, the last of the Emperor Napoleon's Marshals who has just died at Venice.

THE ENGINEERS' STRIKE.

The Executive Council of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers published last week a manifesto or declaration of their objects, views, and intentions with ref rence to the dispute with their employers, in which they declare that "they not descended the discharges of unskilled workmen; they have not endeavoured to throw the skilled operative, not belonging to the society, out of work, nor have they ever recommended others to do so; neither have they contemplated a system of intimidation having that object. They do not seek to fix or to regulate wages, but hold the doctrine that wages should be set led by individual agreement. They do not endeavour to prevent the introduction of machinery but, by their skill and labour, perfect and improve it. They would say further, that they have merely limited themselves to the two questions of overtime and piecework. Having described at some length the evils they allege to result from these practices, and the hardships and unjust treatment they have at made the ve e to the men, they go on to say that they do not deny the r ight to [illegible] ge to engage those he likes, nor to take as many apprentices as he pl ve, provided he teach them himself, and do not call upon the skilled men to instruct them.

This manifesto having been construed into an abandonment of the position which they had originally taken up with regard to the masters, the Executive Council of the Amalgamated Society held a meeting on Sunday last, at which they contradicted the inference of their having changed their attitude, and they agreed to further declaration, in which, with encouraging expressions to perseverance in the struggle, they refer to their present position and prospects. They say:

"Several statements have been put before the public relative to the number of skilled workmen who have gone to work on the shops of our associated employers. It has been said first in Manchester 3000 men have gone in of whom about half are mechanics; and, though it is not expressly stated, the inference which is meant to be drawn is that they have abandoned the contest and signed the declaration.

"That is not true. The number of set sons, whether members of the society or not, who have signed the declaration is quite inconsiderable—not [illegible] indeed, than we could have supposed; but yet the statement of the Employers' Assistant is not to the number; in the shops may be put forty correct. At the factories [illegible] of January. After that date, the number of the body members of the Amalgamated Society in Manchester, 1700 remained in work, and 900 were out. The first proportions still remain unaltered, and of the 1100 who have always remained in work, by far the greater number, like the other skilled workmen not belonging to our society, would give about the number returned by the police as 'at work,' with at any other time, signed the declaration.

"The same remarks apply to the returns made to the London Engineering Association: the totals being compared portions of the men who remained at work, partly of the labourers returned as mechanics, and partly of such skilled workmen, who, under [illegible] such as the influence of declaration, or the fear thus to acknowledge their [illegible] to the masters, have signed.

"In these circumstances, rightly considered, there is no danger—they, more, there is absolute encouragement. The men of the other trades have stood nobly by their cause, and have shown more of devotion than could have been expected from any class. There was never a contest in which those who would treat us as mere machines, who destroyed us the time the [illegible] of men would still make the best, and [illegible] counsels, have been so thoroughly humbled and put to. There must have been, we know, much, if not of actual suffering, of great subtlety, but it has been borne not only unmurmuringly, but for the most part cheerfully. The sense of justice—the consciousness of attempted wrong, the innate natural dignity which prompts every man to assert a right to think and act for himself, have sustained you in trouble, and would have upheld you in a still darker prospect. You know it at right was upon your side. You had nothing to reproach yourselves with—you felt that for you was social elevation; beyond you misery, industrial slavery, and degradation, and you have stood like men. It is well, both for the present and the future, that it has been so. Better, indeed, would the memory of your present endurance appear to you in after years, were [illegible] but it has been borne not only unmurmuringly, but for the most part cheerfully. [illegible] that if we are true to ourselves we must succeed, hope points to a greater and happier future, and assures us that the thought of the present, with its trials and difficulties, will become one of the most glorious of our recollections."

A meeting of the operatives of the metropolis engaged in the brass trade, held on Wednesday evening at the National Hall, Holborn, to express sympathy with the existing engineers' dispute—"That it is the duty of every man connected with the trade, to assist, if the shops by the master engineers was an act of gross injustice, inasmuch as they have thereby thrown large numbers of men out of employment, not only of trade, but also of the Amalgamated Society, and also those who were in no way connected with the dispute in question; and this meeting is also convinced that the question upon which the employers and the operative engineers are at variance has a bearing upon the future rights of all workmen, and as the result of the present contest must materially affect our relative positions, we therefore pledge ourselves to assist the operative engineers by contributions and encouragement while the struggle continues." A second resolution stated—"That this meeting expresses its sympathies with the operatives who have been thrown out of employ by the employers' strike, and is of opinion that their noble, peaceful, and dignified resistance to the unjust demands of the employers demands the admiration and support of the whole working population of the country."

COMMENCEMENT OF THE NEW DOCKS AT SWANSEA.—THE CEREMONY IN DUKE'S-SQUARE.

CELEBRATION OF THE COMMENCEMENT OF SWANSEA DOCKS.

Among the most interesting festivities of our time is the celebration of the commencement of any great work which is to be the means of developing the resources of extensive communication, and thus materially to contribute to the welfare of the district. Of this class were the proceedings at Swansea on the 26th ult., when all ranks of the inhabitants, by their enthusiasm, evinced the importance they attached to the new Docks—a work which, when completed, will undoubtedly give free scope to the natural advantages which Swansea possesses as a port.

Early in the morning the bells of St. Mary's Church rang a joyous peal. Flags waved from the public buildings and across the streets, as well as from the shipping in the harbour, which presented a gay appearance. The Mayor, who had, since his arrival on the previous day, been the guest of Mr. Morgan, the chairman of the Swansea Dock Company, Captain E. Morgan, R.A., arrived at the Guildhall from St. Helen's, and was received most enthusiastically. The members of the several Odd Fellows' lodges, and of the order of Ivorites, who, headed by their bands, had assembled in the morning, marched in procession, occupied the large court of the Town Hall, where also were assembled a large proportion of the inhabitants of the town.

The Mayor, T. Edward Thomas, Esq., having taken the chair, proposed an address to the Queen, which was read by the Town Clerk, and received with much cheering, the noble Marquis was then introduced. The Mayor having read the address, the Marquis of Worcester replied; after which his Lordship proceeded to the great hall, where addresses were presented from the Odd Fellows and Ivorites, which his Lordship graciously received. At one o'clock his Lordship, accompanied by the Mayor, Court, and about 500 of the inhabitants, proceeded to the Nevill Dock, to attend a special meeting of the Swansea Dock Company; and the Marquis of Worcester having taken the chair, the report of the directors was read and adopted, and various other business transacted, the various bodies walked in procession to the site of the Docks, which was very tastefully decorated for the occasion. The whole of the intended site of the Docks was enclosed by a strong fence, and a part of the work of the day was to be performed. The wheelbarrow was of polished mahogany, and the spade and shovel were handsomely mounted with silver. The wheelbarrow was presented by the Marquis of Worcester, the Dock Company, and the borough of Swansea, as a holiday; from the humblest to the highest, all seemed by their conduct and mode of demeanour to indicate that each felt that old ties could not have been severed, but that new ones were to be formed, which would be mutually beneficial. The first act ends with the marriages of Pedro and Sirena and Rodolpho and Bianca, despite of the French proclamation. Before the betrothed enter the chapel, a most important incident occurs: Andreozzi (Mr. Toulmin) dictates to his daughter a plan for the Sicilians to meet in Pedro's forge, there to raise the standard of revolt, and to expel the foreign invaders. In the second act, which passes in the palace of the Governor, that functionary resorts to the aid of Sarasco (Mr. Drayton), a Sicilian necromancer, for an opiate, which is administered to Bianca, who, with her father and the other Sicilian nobles, have been invited to a banquet. Under the influence of the potion Bianca is a somnambulist, and, in the presence of Sirena and Monlue, writes down precisely the same words dictated by her father previously, thus putting the Governor in possession of the entire plans of the Sicilians to annihilate the French. Monlue has Sirena arrested, and Bianca conveyed back to her father's palace, into which, at the dead of night, at the opening of the third act, the Governor basely intrudes; but Rodolpho arrives to save the honour of his wife, and Monlue withdraws, threatening vengeance on both. He is enabled to vent his rage in Pedro's cavern, as the conspirators are surprised by the unexpected arrival of the French troops; and when the Sicilians inquire who has been the traitor, Monlue compels Rodolpho to declare tacitly that he has been false to his country, by showing the husband the fatal paper written by Bianca in her sleep. The Sicilians are furious, Rodolpho is cursed by his own father, the Duke Sangenaro (Mr. S. Jones), Monlue is triumphant, and Bianca alone, although astonished by the silence of Rodolpho at the accusation of treason, still clings with confidence to the despairing Rodolpho. Between the third and fourth acts, the French troops, however, have been defeated by the Sicilians, and the latter place Rodolpho on his trial. He is sentenced to death, but is allowed to have an interview with Bianca, and a most powerful scene ensues, in which he charges her with the treason that he has concealed to save her life. He is moved by her protestations of innocence; and Monlue, arriving as a prisoner just as the French are about to sail from Syracuse, is touched with remorse, and confesses in what manner the paper had been written by Bianca, her faithful follower Sirena being released and confirming Monlue's avowal. The Governor is permitted to depart with the defeated troops, the lovers are rendered happy, and Sicily is free.

Such is the story of the "Sicilian Bride." It is full of interest, especially after the first act: the scene of somnambulism is one of the most exciting ever witnessed; the accusation and self-condemnation of Rodolpho, and his subsequent reproaches of his innocent bride, fulfil all the conditions of profound operatic emotion. The subject is altogether excellently adapted for musical purposes, and affords scope for brilliant spectacle and picturesque groupings. The lesson has been thoroughly liberal in his outlay, and Mr. W. West has invented admirable scenes for the march of the incidents. It is rarely that a more animated scene than that of the forge has been put on the stage: the rushing in of the French troops through the broken wall is managed with amazing reality. The incidental dances are cleverly contrived; and the costumier has carefully marked the epoch in the correct chain armour of the knights. The mise en scène, in short, is, in most respects, striking, gorgeous, and effective, and quite worthy of Mr. Bunn's well-known tact and judgment in mounting great lyric works.

In recording a judgment on the music of Balfe for an opera of such pretensions and proportions as the "Sicilian Bride," we very much regret we have been to hazard an adverse opinion after only a single hearing, with all the uncertainties, contrarieties, and vicissitudes of a first night's execution; but in these fast days, however lofty may be the conception, however elaborate the design, however ambitious may be the models proposed by the composer, the intuitive faculties of some modern critics prompt them to pronounce judgment, finally and despotically, on the opening representation. This slashing style of scrutiny may be smart, but it is manifestly unjust. Balfe, in the new opera, has entered on a new and extended sphere of lyric composition. In his style there is the transition which has been so remarkable in the early and late operas of Rossini, Donizetti, and Meyerbeer; and the simple question now at issue is, whether, in addition to the sweet vein of melody which has made a "Balfe ballad" a proverbial saying, he has attained the higher results of learning and concentration by consummate musicianship and experience. In his early operas the nationality of his melodious inspiration was palpable—it was the song of the Irish minstrel exalted on the soul of the music of the southern sky. From this tendency towards the modern Italian school in later productions, yet still retaining the attributes of artless tune, Balfe approached the forms of the French light opera writers. Now, in the "Sicilian Bride" will be recognised the salient characteristics of the French Grand Opera and of the German masters. His success in this new career will be disputed; the vexed question may not be settled here, but we never entertained a more confident conviction than that we submit in this instance, namely, that however doctors—and we may be permitted to add quacks—may differ here, his triumph with the "Sicilian Bride" in Paris, Berlin, Vienna, or any of the great musical towns of Germany, will be certain. We have some strong reminiscences as to Balfe's antecedents. We recollect the fate of the "Four Brothers Aymon," at the Princess' Theatre, and its subsequent career in Germany, until it was found worthy of acceptance at Her Majesty's Theatre last season; we remember the criticism on the "Bondman" here, and its subsequent popularity in Germany. The "Sicilian Bride" cannot be summarily disposed of at one hearing, and particularly such a one as that which was afforded last Saturday. The second representation, on Tuesday, was a very different affair. Judicious cuts had been made; the prima donna, Miss Crichton, evinced greater self-possession, and her magnificent voice told powerfully in many situations; Mr. Sims Reeves was not quite so exaggerated in his acting as on the first night; Mr. Whitworth was more master of his voice; and the choral and orchestral forces were more steady and correct. The strong impression on our minds, at the first performance, of the unfortunate predominance of the ballads, was fully confirmed. Many of them are complete impediments to the development of the plot. As we propose to return to the consideration of the music—our space this week being so limited—we will but briefly refer to the introduction; to the duo between Bianca and Rodolpho, especially the last movement; and to the finale of the first act; to the bacchanal of French nobles; to the admirable comic duo between Monlue and Salanico; to the ballet music; to the splendid trio in which the somnambulist reveals the state secret, of the second act; to the trio in which Monlue's designs are defeated; the chorus at the forge; the wondrous conception, the chorus of conspirators, "Gather, gather!" sung without accompaniment; and to the finale of the third act; to the concerted piece, the trial of Rodolpho, and to the subsequent exciting duo between him and Bianca, in the third act. We would also invite the special attention of amateurs, who should hear the opera, not once, but twice and thrice, to be keenly alive to its beauties to the largeness of the ideas, and to the proportions of the forms employed therein; to the consistency and coherency with which the composer has preserved throughout the opera, in carrying out its text, the motivo first heard in the overture, and which is sung by Andreozzi "On the fête of St. Clair"—a theme noble, pompous, martial, and national—interwoven with masterly address in the striking situations throughout the opera, a subject enchanting from the beginning, and thrilling in its reiteration, suggested by the highest order of fancy and imagination, and wrought with the scientific completeness of the consummate musician; and if the flow of melody in this opera be not always strikingly original, it is ever graceful, flowing, and unrestrained; whilst the instrumentation is often novel and ingenious, and generally brilliant.

As artistic creations, we must mention those of Miss P. Horton and Mr. Drayton, slight as are the sketches they have to embody. Miss Crichton's glory at present must rest on her splendid voice and excellent phrasing; but give her time, and she will improve as an actress: it is only her second part, and such a one as would exact the powers of a Malibran, a Viardot, or a Grisi to realise. Mr. Sims Reeves is fortunate; never has he had such a chance as in it is opera. Balfe has measured him accurately, and the tenor has been intelligent enough to seize upon the charming phases of Rodolpho's music with unexpected power, feeling, and delicacy. His singing on Tuesday night was beyond all praise. Mr. Whitworth has increased his rising reputation by his careful vocalisation.

We shall next week engrave a scene from the opera.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY-LANE.

"THE SICILIAN BRIDE," GRAND OPERA, IN FOUR ACTS. THE LIBRETTO BY M. ST. GEORGES AND MR. BUNN, AND MUSIC BY BALFE.

The scene is in Sicily, in the thirteenth century, coëval with the "Sicilian Vespers;" but, with the poet's license, that awful event is not referred to, and another agency is employed by the dramatist to put down the tyranny exercised by the Marquis Monlue (Mr. Whitworth), Governor for Charles of Anjou. At the rising of the curtain, Syracuse is seen, with Mount Ætna in the distance; in the foreground is the portico of a chapel. Sirena (Miss E. Isaacs) and Pedro (Miss P. Horton), an armourer, are about to be married, but the relief of the Governor forbids the Sicilians to intermarry. Fortunately for the lovers, the deadly feuds of the Andreozzis and Sangenaros (the Capulets and Montagues, or Guelphs and Ghibellines of Sicily) are terminated by the common resolve to throw off the hated yoke of France; and as Rodolpho de Sangenaro (Mr. Sims Reeves) has saved the life of Bianca Andreozzi (Miss Crichton), and they are mutually attached, the first act ends with the marriages of Pedro and Sirena and Rodolpho and Bianca, despite of the French proclamation. Before the betrothed enter the chapel, a most important incident occurs: Andreozzi (Mr. Toulmin) dictates to his daughter a plan for the Sicilians to meet in Pedro's forge, there to raise the standard of revolt, and to expel the foreign invaders. In the second act, which passes in the palace of the Governor, that functionary resorts to the aid of Sarasco (Mr. Drayton), a Sicilian necromancer, for an opiate, which is administered to Bianca, who, with her father and the other Sicilian nobles, have been invited to a banquet. Under the influence of the potion Bianca is a somnambulist, and, in the presence of Sirena and Monlue, writes down precisely the same words dictated by her father previously, thus putting the Governor in possession of the entire plans of the Sicilians to annihilate the French. Monlue has Sirena arrested, and Bianca conveyed back to her father's palace, into which, at the dead of night, at the opening of the third act, the Governor basely intrudes; but Rodolpho arrives to save the honour of his wife, and Monlue withdraws, threatening vengeance on both. He is enabled to vent his rage in Pedro's cavern, as the conspirators are surprised by the unexpected arrival of the French troops; and when the Sicilians inquire who has been the traitor, Monlue compels Rodolpho to declare tacitly that he has been false to his country, by showing the husband the fatal paper written by Bianca in her sleep. The Sicilians are furious, Rodolpho is cursed by his own father, the Duke Sangenaro (Mr. S. Jones), Monlue is triumphant, and Bianca alone, although astonished by the silence of Rodolpho at the accusation of treason, still clings with confidence to the despairing Rodolpho. Between the third and fourth acts, the French troops, however, have been defeated by the Sicilians, and the latter place Rodolpho on his trial. He is sentenced to death, but is allowed to have an interview with Bianca, and a most powerful scene ensues, in which he charges her with the treason that he has concealed to save her life. He is moved by her protestations of innocence; and Monlue, arriving as a prisoner just as the French are about to sail from Syracuse, is touched with remorse, and confesses in what manner the paper had been written by Bianca, her faithful follower Sirena being released and confirming Monlue's avowal. The Governor is permitted to depart with the defeated troops, the lovers are rendered happy, and Sicily is free.

Such is the story of the "Sicilian Bride." It is full of interest, especially after the first act: the scene of somnambulism is one of the most exciting ever witnessed; the accusation and self-condemnation of Rodolpho, and his subsequent reproaches of his innocent bride, fulfil all the conditions of profound operatic emotion. The subject is altogether excellently adapted for musical purposes, and affords scope for brilliant spectacle and picturesque groupings. The lessee has been thoroughly liberal in his outlay, and Mr. W. West has invented admirable scenes for the march of the incidents. It is rarely that a more animated scene than that of the forge has been put on the stage: the rushing in of the French troops through the broken wall is managed with amazing reality. The incidental dances are cleverly contrived; and the costumier has carefully marked the epoch in the correct chain armour of the knights. The mise en scène, in short, is, in most respects, striking, gorgeous, and effective, and quite worthy of Mr. Bunn's well-known tact and judgment in mounting great lyric works.

In recording a judgment on the music of Balfe for an opera of such pretensions and proportions as the "Sicilian Bride," we very much regret we have been to hazard an adverse opinion after only a single hearing, with all the uncertainties, contrarieties, and vicissitudes of a first night's execution; but in these fast days, however lofty may be the conception, however elaborate the design, however ambitious may be the models proposed by the composer, the intuitive faculties of some modern critics prompt them to pronounce judgment, finally and despotically, on the opening representation. This slashing style of scrutiny may be smart, but it is manifestly unjust. Balfe, in the new opera, has entered on a new and extended sphere of lyric composition. In his style there is the transition which has been so remarkable in the early and late operas of Rossini, Donizetti, and Meyerbeer; and the simple question now at issue is, whether, in addition to the sweet vein of melody which has made a "Balfe ballad" a proverbial saying, he has attained the higher results of learning and concentration by consummate musicianship and experience. In his early operas the nationality of his melodious inspiration was palpable—it was the song of the Irish minstrel exalted on the soul of the music of the southern sky. From this tendency towards the modern Italian school in later productions, yet still retaining the attributes of artless tune, Balfe approached the forms of the French light opera writers. Now, in the "Sicilian Bride" will be recognised the salient characteristics of the French Grand Opera and of the German masters. His success in this new career will be disputed; the vexed question may not be settled here, but we never entertained a more confident conviction than that we submit in this instance, namely, that however doctors—and we may be permitted to add quacks—may differ here, his triumph with the "Sicilian Bride" in Paris, Berlin, Vienna, or any of the great musical towns of Germany, will be certain. We have some strong reminiscences as to Balfe's antecedents. We recollect the fate of the "Four Brothers Aymon," at the Princess' Theatre, and its subsequent career in Germany, until it was found worthy of acceptance at Her Majesty's Theatre last season; we remember the criticism on the "Bondman" here, and its subsequent popularity in Germany. The "Sicilian Bride" cannot be summarily disposed of at one hearing, and particularly such a one as that which was afforded last Saturday. The second representation, on Tuesday, was a very different affair. Judicious cuts had been made; the prima donna, Miss Crichton, evinced greater self-possession, and her magnificent voice told powerfully in many situations; Mr. Sims Reeves was not quite so exaggerated in his acting as on the first night; Mr. Whitworth was more master of his voice; and the choral and orchestral forces were more steady and correct. The strong impression on our minds, at the first performance, of the unfortunate predominance of the ballads, was fully confirmed. Many of them are complete impediments to the development of the plot. As we propose to return to the consideration of the music—our space this week being so limited—we will but briefly refer to the introduction; to the duo between Bianca and Rodolpho, especially the last movement; and to the finale of the first act; to the bacchanal of French nobles; to the admirable comic duo between Monlue and Salanico; to the ballet music; to the splendid trio in which the somnambulist reveals the state secret, of the second act; to the trio in which Monlue's designs are defeated; the chorus at the forge; the wondrous conception, the chorus of conspirators, "Gather, gather!" sung without accompaniment; and to the finale of the third act; to the concerted piece, the trial of Rodolpho, and to the subsequent exciting duo between him and Bianca, in the third act. We shall next week engrave a scene from the opera.

SADLER'S WELLS.

The Gowrie plot is one of the most obscure points of Scottish history; but the "Restairig Correspondence," some few years ago, threw considerable light upon the transaction, and showed that Logan, of Restairig, had some concern in that notable affair, and was, indeed, the party who enticed James VI. to Perth, where the enterprise which he had planned failed in the hands which he meant should carry it out, the Earl of Gowrie and his brother Alexander Ruthven. This view of the subject was taken up by the Rev. Mr. White, who tried his maiden hand at a tragedy on the neglected theme, taking for his basis the foresaid correspondence. Accordingly, in 1846, he gave to the public a drama, under the title of "The Earl of Gowrie," which certainly seemed to afford a clever solution of the mystery. With some alterations this tragedy has at length reached the stage, and on Saturday last proved successful in the performance of Mr. Phelps and his company. The manager has lately won considerable reputation by his dexterous use of the Scottish dialect, and the character of James VI. affords ample opportunity for his skilful command of it as the colouring of a very complex though unpromising part, yet drawn with first-rate dramatic instinct. The character of James VI. is strongly antagonised by that of Logan of Restairig (Mr. G. Bennett). It is throughout diamond cut diamond, but the advantages of scholarship and position belong to James, and thus King-craft at length prevails over mother wit, and the denouement is favourable to the wily, crafty, double-dealing, mean, and cowardly Monarch, whom, while we despise, we cannot help admiring for his learning and cunning. The latter substitutes the finer parts of wisdom; and, poor as it is, from some intrinsic relation with the nobler quality, fairly wins the final victory. Never was a part played with a finer appreciation of the salient points in an unique character than James VI. by Mr. Phelps. The entire interest of the piece was involved in its possible development, and the whole was realised with a skill and tact nothing short of admirable. In these individualities there is no doubt that Mr. Phelps is a decided master, and it will not be his fault if the play prove not eminently attractive. It will be entirely owing to its deficiency of interest as a story—its artistic interest is decidedly first-rate. Mr. Marston, as the Earl of Gowrie, had an amiable and honourable character to support, and performed it with dignity and ease. There is little or no female interest in the play, though there are several female characters. The most ambitious, but least efficiently developed, is the Countess Gowrie (Miss Goddard); the next in importance is Catharine Logan, by Miss Cooper; but the most pleasing, and decidedly best acted, was Lady Beatrix Ruthven, by Miss Feist. The denouement of the play is painful, and perhaps revolting to those who wish the virtuous to succeed and the wicked to be punished; but it is true to daily experience as well as history; and, no doubt, the judicious audience at this theatre will look at it in the proper light.

LYCEUM.

The "Game of Speculation" and the "Prince of Happy Land" still continue their successful run. From both, this week, we give Illustrations—in the third month of their attraction. This "is a happiness" of which only this management may boast. The first of our Illustrations takes an early incident in the play, in which Hawk explains to his dearer half how like puppets he moves his creditors and dupes.

Mr. C. Mathews acts the quasi situation inimitably; and we feel the while that all are marionettes—all, both on and off the stage. It is a great improvement on the Shaksperian "men and women, merely players. This dallying with the subject is as full of reflection as that of Hamlet with Ophelia—as full of pain and madness, sometimes, in the real world. But at the Lyceum they manage these things differently. There all is turned to sport and pleasure, and the priests of the temple minister to the delight of admiring multitudes. We cannot do better than give a portion of the scene:—

MR. AFFABLE HAWK," MR. CHARLES MATHEWS. "MRS. HAWK," MRS. HORN.

SCENE I., ACT I., FROM "THE GAME OF SPECULATION," AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE.

Hawk. My dear Caroline, do not attempt to judge my means of action. In this world, nothing is trifling—nothing too insignificant. Just now, you were trying to win over the servants by gentleness. Error, my dear—complete error! You should be firm as the Iron Duke, and as brief.

Mrs. H. And why issue commands, when you cannot pay?

Hawk. My love, the principle of social existence is extremely simple. Pay with gold, when you can—when you can't, pay with brass.

Mrs. H. But we often obtain, through affection, services which are refused to ——

Hawk. Through affection! How little you know the present age. Now, nothing but selfishness exists. Every one places his future in the Three per Cents. There lies our paradise. The wife knows her husband is insured; the son insures his father's life. All our morals lie in dividends! As to servants, we change them every day. Attachment, indeed! pay them their wages regularly, and they leave you without regret; but owe them money, and you keep them devoted to the last.

Mrs. H. Oh! You, so honourable, you to utter such things!

Hawk. I utter what we all feel, but what few have the boldness to avow. Here lies modern honour (holding up half-a-crown). Chivalry has shrivelled into that! Shall I tell you why plays succeed which have scoundrels for their heroes? It is because the spectator is flattered, and says to himself as he goes away, "Come, come, hang it, after all I'm not such a scamp as he is."

Mrs. H. No, no!

Hawk. My dear Caroline, I see my levity wounds you, but consider our positions. Are we not suffering for the crime of our partner, Sparrow, who decamped with all our funds? You know the honour and integrity with which I raised our house to wealth—a house untainted in reputation till that fatal act reduced us all to beggary. The fault was not mine, but what was to be done? A coward would have destroyed himself. Not I. Die! never. I had not lived so long in the world, my dear, without discovering its weaknesses. I had not mixed so much with monied men, without reading their inmost souls—and so, like a man of that world in which I had studied, I gaily accepted the new position forced upon me. Necessity, mark me not choice, compelled me to it; and thenceforth determined to give the world the benefits of the lessons it had taught me, and turn my very ruin into amusement.

Mrs. H. Your elasticity of mind was commendable, no doubt, but is the line you have taken justifiable?

Hawk. Perfectly. The speculators who enriched themselves quietly under the shadow of my former successes, are now the toys and puppets with which I divert my leisure and dispel my melancholy. When I am dull I pull their strings (imitates the action of pulling the strings of a puppet), and they dance till I am merry again. The game of speculation which I formerly played for love, I now play for money, that's all.

Here is the entire spirit and almost the whole plot of the piece—the proposition, as it were, of the action. Never was a story of the kind more skilfully wrought out.

The second Illustration shows the Point-lace Chamber, the boudoir of Princess Desiderata, in the Tower of Tapers, from the extravaganza of the "Prince of Happy Land." The absurd and sublime are cleverly blended in this scene, and thus the great object of burlesque is attained. Its pictorial ornamentation is first-rate. Part of the dialogue may be given with advantage.

Floretta sings:—

Many there are in the richest frames
Should have the power to tell the names;
For so completely they're uncog.,
You can't believe the catalogue.
Could they silence break,
For politeness' sake,
We their words must take,
As to who they're meant for.

(The Picture is brought on and place in the centre of the stage, the attendants draw the curtains, and discover the Portrait of PRINCE FELIX full length and the size of life.)

Princess D. (Staring and aside to FLORETTA.)
'Tis he, Floretta, like as can be;
Flo. A prettier fellow, I'd ne'er wish to see!
Duchess. Towards our daughter turn'd both its eyes
Duke. It opes its mouth!
Portrait. (to PRINCESS) Love Felix, or he dies!
Duke. It spoke—I heard it speak, with mine own ears
Princess D. The same sweet voice!
Flo. Its eyes seem full of tears
Say something kind to it, for pity's sake;
It sighs as if its very frame would break
Princess D. (to PORTRAIT)
New life to Felix if her love can give,
Desiderata bids her Felix live.
Flo. Look, look, what rapture now in every feature
It understands you like a living creature.
Portrait. (to PRINCESS.)
Sweet Princess, Felix lives for you alone!
Flo. Show me a painting equals that for tone.
Princess D. There's not an artist in the whole profession,
Could show one to surpass it in expression.

THE POINT-LACE CHAMBER, FROM THE "PRINCE OF HAPPY LAND," AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE.

Duke. I do remember a wax-doll I saw,
That mov'd its eyes, and said "Pa-pa, Ma-ma."
Duchess. But this chef d'œuvre hears as well as talks!
Fio It beats al. heads in crayons, ma'am, by chalks.
Duchess. [to PRINCESS]
But do you really, mean, child, what you've said?
Duke. Ay, have you made your mind up on this head?
Princess D. Sir, in this portrait I the features trace
Of him I love:
Duke. She says it to his face!
Princess D. And whom I'll marry, if you've no objection.
Duke. Marry, not I—we sanction your selection.

This is light, elegant writing, and does credit even to Mr. Planché, who, by general consent, is admitted to have gained laurels or myrtles in this kind of composition never yet worn by mortal out of elfin-land.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Mr. Frederick Gye has just issued his prospectus for the sixth season, which is to commence on Tuesday the 23d inst. The principal items specified in the document were exclusively published in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of last Saturday; but there are some interesting additions.

The re-engagements are Grisi and Viardot, Madame Castellan, Mdlle Bertrand, Mdlle Anna Zerr, and Mdlle Ortri; Signori Mario, Calzolari, Mei, Soldi, Tamberlik (tenors); Ronconi, Rommi, Taglafico, Polonini, Gregorio, Rache, Marini (his first appearance these three years), and Herr Formes (barytones and basses).

The new engagements are Madame Gazzaniga, the famed prima donna from Italy; Mdlle. Theresa Saguin, a new contralto; and, possibly, Madame Medori from St. Petersburg and Brussels; Signor Galvani, the tenor, from Milan; Herr Ander, the great German tenor; M. Gassymard, the celebrated Francatenor; and Sig. Bartolini, a new barytone, from Brussels and Palermo

The part of the prospectus which will surprise our readers the most, and which is likely to provoke no little discussion, is the announcement of the arrangements for the virtual revival of the ballet, which, at the establishment, has been regarded as defunct. Divertissements after short operas are to be restored, instead of giving scraps of works. Mdlle. Robert Mdlle. Louise Taglioni, and Mdlle Brasil already known at the Royal Italian Opera, are re-engaged; as also the Mdlles. Bellotti, Mdle Lebland, Mdlle. Kolasnburg, and MM. Mynard, Frey, and Rnal. M. Alexandre is ballet master, and M. Alfred Mellon resumes his old post as leader of the ballet. It is announced, also, that the orchestra and chorus have received several important additions.

ST. JAMES'S.

On Wednesday week Mdlle. Dejazet appeared in a new petit pièce, called "Cæsar et Napoleon" in this she personates a widow long enamoured of a young bachelor to ascertain the state of his affections. She finds that true to his early impressions, though nearly ruined by dissipation. Accordingly, she repairs his fortunes, and confers on him her hand. On Friday this talented actress concluded her present engagement by performing on the present occasion three characters—the Duc de Richelieu, the Napoleon of the piece above described, and the Comtesse de Brienne and Sébastien in "Le Domicile de Brienne." She was much applauded.

On Monday M. Lemaitre and Mdle. Clarisse made their first appearance for the season, "Don Cæsar de Bazan" being the piece. Who can forget the character like Lemaitre—with those nice shades and distinctions of feeling and habit, those minute differences of situation, those subtle traits and small acts in which he worlds of meaning? Mdlle. Clarisse has also won golden opinions, and deserved them. The greeting of both on the present occasion was sincere and ardent. It is quite a treat to enjoy their acting in this drama, notwithstanding its length, for it is performed in five acts.

PRINCESS'.

On Saturday was placed on the stage a new and original farce by Mr. Tom Taylor, affording characteristic opportunities for Mr. and Mrs. Keeley and Mr. Wigan. The title at once discloses the nature of the interest:—"Our Clerk; or, No 3, Fig-tree-court, Temple." As a picture of barrister life this farce is good, though somewhat too broadly sketched, perhaps, and with a sm Hogarthian touch, less attractive than some nearer samples of caricature painting in this age of refined speech of society. Job Maracot and Richard Hazard, Esqs., inhabit the same set of chambers, and have two clerks—a fast one and a slow one —Edward Sharpus and John Puddicombe. These latter, performed by the Keeleys, are humorous portraits. A lad's incipient fit of cigar-smoking is exceedingly well managed. Then they feast some of the Temple nursery-maids, during the master's absence, in first-rate style; and most stirring is the confusion of packing the girls into the bed-rooms, and the tables into the cupboard, on the return of Hazard from a sudden marriage trip with his newly-made bride. There is also a Sheriff-officer's man, by Mr. Meadows, the make-up of which is capital. The slow reluses to leave the chambers because he is placed in custody on execution for debt. The perplexity of all parties is conducted with great humour. It was well acted, and deservedly successful.

OLYMPIC.

A new piece by Mr. Fitzball, called the "Last of the Fairies," has been produced at this theatre. This little drama derives its title from its heroine, Alice Brook (Miss Sarah Lyons), disguising herself as one of the fairies, in order to frighten off the scandal-mongers from the concealment of her father and her lover. A comic underplot between two domestics, personated between Mr. W. Shalders and Mrs. Alfred Phillips, furnished certainly the most amusing scenes; though the whole is possessed, as might be expected, of popular elements.

PUNCH'S PLAYHOUSE.

Mr. Palgrave Simpson has given a new drama to this theatre, under the title of "Mesmeric Proprietress." Two leading companies introduce a lady and gentleman to each other, who both prove poor, but loving. Though mutually deceived, they resolve to wed. The bubble agents, however, lose their fees, and then, to the ultimate amusement of the house, abuse each other and their dupes. The piece was successful.

A new tragedy on the subject of "Timoleon" has been brought out at the Adelphi Theatre, Edinburgh. The author is Mr. R. W. Jamieson, W.S., and the dialogue is stated to be nervous and poetical. The practice of essaying new dramas on the provincial stage deserves encouragement; and as to such can it as Edinburgh and Dublin, they are as much entitled as London to take theatrical initiatives, and they merit censure for not having done so frequently, indeed habitually.

BUST OF KOSSUTH.—A new bust of the eloquent Magyar, by Mr. J. Bailey, a young artist, of Cornbut-place, Paddington, has just appeared. The artist has succeeded in the likeness, and the firm set head and bold open brow of Kossuth are admirably given: the features have the reflective expression of the statesman, and the bust is placed upon the works of Shakspeare as a portfolio, characteristic of Kossuth having declared that he learnt the English language from the works of our great dramatic poet. This is Mr. Bailey's first public production in a difficult branch of art, in which he has here achieved much, with high promise of future excellence.

THE ST. GEORGE'S CHESS CLUB, HALIFAX.—This club had, on Wednesday evening week, the honour of a visit from the celebrated Hungarian chess-player, Herr Löwenthal, who gratified the numerous assemblage of the members and their friends by playing six games simultaneously, in all which he gave odds proportioned to the strength of his opponents. The result of this interesting contest was a victory for the distinguished chess-player in four games out of the six. The other two were won by Courtney Kenny Clarke, Esq., at the odds of the King's Knight, and by the secretary, Mr. Edward Cronheim, at the odds of the Pawn and move. Amongst the four games won by Mr. Löwenthal, there was one exceedingly well contested by Mr. Thomas, at the odds of Pawn and move, which lasted five hours.

It appears that there were on the 18th ult., as stated in a Parliamentary paper just published, 304 paper-mills at work in England, 48 in Scotland and 28 in Ireland, making 380. There were 1616 bearing engines at work, and 130 silent.

The works of the railway from St. Petersburg to Warsaw are being carried out with extraordinary activity. The number of workmen at present exceeds 10,000, and they work during part of the night. All the rails necessary for this immense line are to be delivered by the end of July, and the contracts for the supply of locomotives have just been signed.

From Cologne we learn that a collision took place on the morning of the 24 instant between the, Beehoven and the No 23, one going up and the other coming down the Rhine. The Beehoven was so much damaged that she went down soon after, but all the passengers were saved. The No. 23 experienced less injury.

A letter from Vienna states that the Austrian Government is preparing to carry into execution two undertakings of high importance to the commercial and manufacturing interests—the improvement of the navigation of the Adige, and the construction of a railway from Botzen, in the Tyrol, to Verona.

A whole family, at Long Sutton, have been nearly poisoned from partaking of a pudding boiled in a pan which had been recently used by a relation for boiling arsenic. It had been subsequently scalded, and this was deemed sufficient to avert any ill effects.

MUSIC.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS

Sir George Clerk, Bart., M.P., F.R.S., presided at the 114th anniversary festival of the Royal Society of Musicians, celebrated in the Free Masons' Hall, last Tuesday. A more efficient chairman could not have been selected to advocate the cause of this ancient and admirable institution. Sir George Clerk was one of the founders of the Royal Academy of Music, and acts as chairman of the Committee of Management in the absence of the Earl of Westmorland. As a practised amateur, Sir George Clerk's love of the art is well known, and he has ever been foremost to uphold the interests of the musical profession. His address on this occasion, in proposing the loyal and constitutional toasts, were excellent, and thoroughly applicable to the benevolent objects of the society, and were earnestly applauded by the numerous assemblage of guests, and by the ladies who graced the gallery and seats at the end of the hall by their interesting presence, inspiring the hope that the time may come when the fairer portion of the creation, instead of having to gaze upon the feeling of the hour, may take their places at the banquet. The honorary counsel of the society (T. H. Hall, Esq.) also spoke emphatically on behalf of music and musicians during the evening. The collection was therefore liberal, after the oratory and the musical treat provided by the comic talent, consisting of Messrs. Anderson, W. S. Bennett, R. Barnett, Card Coote, J. B. Chatterton, W. Cramer, Cr.ffin, R. Hutton, W. H. Holmes, Hill, Macfarren, M'Farren, G. Perry, Rawlins, Salaman, Wally, and Watkins. Amongst the donations were the Hon. firm of Broadwood, which has placed the magnificent pianoforte sent to the Exhibition, and valued at £120), at the disposal of the institution. Collard and Collard gave 50 guineas; the committee of the deluged Ancient Concerts, the balance in hand of their funds, £22 14s. 4d.; Sir G. Clerk, 10 guineas; M. Costa, Esq., 5 guineas; Rev. Mr. Hamilton, 5 guineas; the council of the disbanded Orchestral Society, £15; S. Cartwright, Esq., 5 guineas, besides other contributions. As regards the financial condition of the society, the receipts in 1851 were £2314 6s. 9d.; and the expenditure £2585 19s 8d., leaving a balance in hand of £228 17s. 11d. In the next ay, the working expense is down for only £230, so that £2355 19s. 8d. has been actually expended in monthly payments to aged musicians, widows, and orphans, in temporary relief and funerals, in premiums to apprentices, rewards and annoiding, and benefactions to aged claimants, as also a sum to indigent musicians and widows having no claim on the institution. These figures are indeed eloquent, and speak for themselves.

The musical gleanings of this festival comprised the "Non Nobis," followed by Dr. Cooke's "Amen," the National Anthem, Mr. J. M'Murrie's 0-simile glee for four voices, the parts being trebled (re-commanded); Sir H. R. Bishop's glee, "Blow gentle gales," Weber's "Glorious Apollo," Mr. Walmersley's glee, "I wish to thee;" Mr. W. Beale's madrigal, "What not happens," and Mr. Balfe's duet from "Joan of Arc," "Oh, as shepherd pipe," sung by Miss Seymour, a pupil of Mr. Rovedino and Mr. Whitehouse. Miss Dolby sang Mr. Henry Smart's sacred air, "A pilgrim in the vale of tears." Miss Birch gave Mr. G. Lunley's ba lad, "I was happy ere I loved you?" Miss Rainforth sang Mr. Hatton's clever song, "Chloris," with such classic taste as to elicit a rapturous encore; Mr. Swift gave a song by Alt; and Mr. Donald King sang Dibdin's glorious song, "Tom Bowling." The solo executants were Mr. Watson in a clarionet fantasia, and Mr. Benson in a soothing pianoforte piece. The accompanyists were Mr. C. Potter and Mr. W. S. Bennett; and the following singers took part in the glees:—Messrs. Benson, D. King, Bayley, Barnbi, Fraser, Coward, Rovedino, Sandler, Melloll, Mr. Smith, Howe, Weiss, &c. The matches compared for the society by Winter and Sir H. R. Bishop were executed by a band including Baumann, G. Cooke, W. Card, Card, jun., Egerton, Godfrey, the Harpers, Lazarus, Malsch, Rae, Winterbottom, Peoples, &c. In addition to these musical enjoyments, it may be added, in justice to the new proprietors of the hall, that the reform in public dinners, so long required, has been begun by them in earnest, and that their banquet, both in quality and attendance, was universally approved of.

The annual concert for the benefit of the society will take place at Exeter hall, on Monday, April 26th.

MUSICAL EVENTS.

MR. LAURENT'S PRIZE WALTZ.—On Monday afternoon, the trial for the prize of ten guineas, given by Mr. Charles Emile Laurent, took place at the Argyll Rooms, in the presence of a numerous and fashionable auditory. Amongst the jury were the following amateurs and professors: Viscount Burghersh, Lord Gerald Fitzgerald, Sir Henry Webb, Bart., Captain Hugh Baillie, Captain Breedon, Messrs. Albert Smith, Charles Kenny, Willert Beale, A. J. Lesie, J. Browne, C. L. Gruneisen, Barret, Boose, Bosisio, Dervieu, Godfrey, J. Herz, Labarre, Lazarus, Macfarlane, Mellon, Nadaud, Pilati, Pluys, Prater, Reisenauer, Scholz, J. H. Severn, Tutton, Waddell, Zerlini, &c. The same proceedings were adopted as in the case of the Prize Quadrille, won by Mr. Tutton. The competitors on this occasion were Messrs. C. Coote, F. G. Tenney, J. G Calkett, H. Laurent, and W. H. Montgomery. The compositions were marked Z, N, V, P, and X. For Z and P there were no votes, N obtained 6, X 8, and V 20; the latter was, of course, proclaimed the winner, who proved to be Mr. W. H. Montgomery. Of the accuracy of the verdict of the jury there cannot be the smallest doubt, as the winning waltz, of the Labitzky school, is marked with such captivating variety and elegance, and is so roguishly dansant; but N displayed, perhaps, the most striking originality of idea and treatment, and if it had not been that Mr. Winwood have carried off, we suspect, some of the votes given to X. In all the waltzes the instrumentation was worthy of especial praise, and the scoring indicated the great improvement that has taken place in dance music since the days of Strauss, Lanitzky, Musard, Julien, Tolbecque, Basilio, &c. Mr. C. E. Laurent's excellent orchestra executed the waltzes to pe fection.

The executants were Messrs. Loder, Hill, Oury, Watson, Webb, G. Pratt, Pratt, Charles Hall, and Mr. Benson vocalist. At the two last concerts, Mr. Leonard, the celebrated Belgian violinist, and Mdme. THE ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION.—At the second concert of the new series, last Monday night, at Willis's Rooms, Mrs. Anderson, Miss Williams, Messrs. Lockey, Hobbs, Francis, Land, and Phillips sang a variety of glees, madrigals, and ancient songs, to the delight of a numerous and fashionable auditory. On Tuesday, the "Union" sang at Lady Chantrey's party in Eaton-square, at which about 300 of the fashionable world were present.

A concert took place on Thursday night at the Marylebone Literary Institution, at which the following artistes were engaged:—Misses Poole, Rainforth, and Wells; Messrs. Harrison, T. Williams, Weiss; Mrs. John Macfarren. Mr. W. Macfarren. Mr G. Case, and Mr. J. Banister.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

The great musical event in Paris was the return of Lablache last Saturday, as Don Basil in the "Barber of Seville," Mdlle. Cruvelli being the Rosina. Mr. Lumley's privilege, or patent, is to be renewed for fifty years, and its Government guarantee increased to £4000 per season. The receipts at the Parisian theatres, grand opera, and other public amusements, during January, were upwards of £20,000; the three days' Carnival caused an increase in the amount of at least £4,000; the three days' Carnival caused an increase in the amount of at least £4,000; the three days' Carnival caused an increase in the amount of at least £4

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE MINIE RIFLE.—The practice carried on with this new arm on Monday week at Woolwich was at 600 yards, and very satisfactory. The officers and non-commissioned officers on the same day proceeded to the marshes and fired a number of rounds at 800 yards range. The practice at that distance gave a result of one in every five balls fired striking the target, and they all went the entire length of the range. During three days of last week a rifle was shown on a plan submitted by Lord Raglan, and some very good practice made with it at 600 yards range. It is much thicker in the barrel and about a foot shorter than the Minié rifle. The artillery practice was equally satisfactory. The six 12-pounder of the troops of the Royal Horse Artillery were brought forward to a position at 800 yards range, and five rounds from each piece fired from each of the howitzers. The practice was very good at that long range and showed how dest ructive the Royal Horse Artillery could be with that description of arm, which can be brought into action with great facility with one or four horses, and moved and fired by the gunner with as much facility as their light 6-pounders. The 9-pounder field battery was drawn up at 1000 yards range, and fired spherical shells at that distance.

SIGNAL TELEGRAPH FOR THE FIELD.—At the close of the firing at Woolwich, above named, Major Brownrigg, of the Grenadier Guards, instructed detachments of the Royal Artillery in making signals, or telegraphing intelligence, to each other by a plain and simple mode always at hand to operate with. Two w inners, six carrying their shares on the muzzles of their muskets, and another carrying their pendants in the same way, marched forward to a hill about 700 yards from the mound. Three of the gunners carrying their shares on the muzzles of their carbines, and three their pendants, were then marched to the mound, and took up a position on the top of it. The three carrying their shares in front, and the three carrying their pendants in the rear, each person stood about two steps from the other. The other six occupied similar positions at the distance of 700 yards from the party who first ascended the hill. The telegraphic communications commenced by the three front gunners on the mound facing their centre, surrounded by their six mates and pendant bearers, and were then translated by Major Brownrigg and responded to by the other three men who apply red facing their carbines, surmounted by their pendants, to their front. A similar movement was made by the latter party, and the communications made with their pendants. The shakes and gestures were subsequently raised two at a time and one at a time, from right to left and left to right, evidently form ng a very comprehensive alphabet for conveying intelligence. The party was then brought in by the right flank, the one marching behind the other, when the event through a similar course of operation and both parties soon comprehended the object in view, and responded to each other with great readiness.

MAJOR-GENERAL Bainbrigge, C.B., has been selected for the important charge of the command of the forces stationed in Canada, in succession to Lieut.-General Smelt, G.B., whose promotion at the last brought vacancies to the command from that situation.

BRIGADE-MAJOR OF CAVALRY.—Lieut.-Colonel Cotton, unattached, succeeds Lord Jocelyn as Major of Brigade to the Cavalry in London. Lieut.-Colonel Cotton was formerly in the 7th Hussars, with which distinguished regiment he served in the Peninsula.

By the army estimates for 18 2 53 it appears that the following officers have received rewards for distinguished services:—Major-General William Jervois, in addition to £100 a year already received by him, £100; Major-General Sir William Chalmers, C.B., in addition to £100 a year already received by him, £ 00; Major-General William Campbell, C.B., in addition to £100 a year already received by him, £100; Major-General Sir Archibald Alexander, K.C.B., in addition to £100 a year already received by him, £100; Major-Gen. Frank Caswell, in addition to £100 a year already received by him, £100; Lieut.-General Conyngham Greaves, £300; Lieut.-General Arthur Lloyd, same head; Major-General Thomas B Aylmer, £400; Major-General Sir De Lacy Evans, K.C.B., in addition to his present allowance of £100 per annum, £100; Major-General Alexander Fleming, £400; Major-General A. Macmillan, £300.

The provisions, such as pemican, corned beef, bacon, &c., to be supplied to the new Arctic searching squadron, will be of very superior quality, and are now in course of preparation, under the superintendence of Captain Sir E Parry and Mr. Reid, of the Clarence Victualling-yard.

YEOMANRY CAVALRY IN KENT.—Orders have been given by the Lord-Lieutenant of Kent to the commanding officers of the East and West Kent regiments of yeomanry cavalry, with reference to the late decision of the State for the Home Department, requiring that all the respective troops be rendered up to their full complement, and to commence their drills, with sword exercise and pistol practice at targets, dismounted.

The damage to the ships of war in the Mediterranean during the late gale will not cost the Government much less than 4,000 sterling. The gravest of the items of damage are—Albion, ran on board; Bellerophon, carried away her fore-topmast; Medea, foremast; Medina, fore-topmast; Medusa, paddle-box washed away, and other damage not precisely known. Vengeance lost a gun overboard, and another ran through her port. She is a very unhappy ship, in her wardroom at least—four of her lieutenants out of five having left her.

The Admiralty have ordered her Majesty's steamer Hecate to proceed down the Channel, to relieve the wind-bound merchantmen with provisions and water.

The Herald, Captain Denham, R.N., has been commissioned for a survey of the Feejee Islands and New Caledonia, which it is proposed we occupy for the purpose of coaling the steamers which may be employed for stoppages of steamers in crossing the Pacific Ocean, and to assert the rights of Great Britain over certain groups of islands discovered by Captain Cook. Captain Denham has received instructions to harbours and ports suitable for such occupation. A small steamer accompanies the Herald, and both ships are already supplied with axes, knives, beads, tomahawks, saws, and other articles calculated for traffic with the natives of the several islands.

MUTINY AND SANGUINARY AFFRAY.

On Saturday last, in the Mersey, a sanguinary conflict of a mutinous character took place on board the American emigrant ship The Queen of the West, Captain More. This vessel, which is one of the largest packet-ships leaving the port of Liverpool, hauled out of the Wellington Dock about eleven o'clock in the forenoon, on her way to New York. When about a mile down the river, arriving the turn of the tide, one set of officers was engaged in calling the roll of emigrants, and the captain and chief mate began to muster the crew. Twenty had answered to their names (the ship's complement), when some of the crew, George Freeman, stepped forward, and observed to the captain that they were shorthanded; and that the proper complement of men for a ship like that would be 30, and were that he were not going in the ship that short-handed. The captain, in his evidence given at the magistrates' investigation at the police office in Rodney-street, on Monday, says:—

"I turned coolly to the man, and told him I had gone to sea with less men, and should be if he could do more than one man's work—to which he replied "Yes," and that he would have to do it in this case. I told him to go forward. He did so. On Freeman joining Alexander, Jack, and Henry Downes, they all began muttering. I followed the men to the forecastle, and ordered them again to go to work. When I got forward, Freeman said it was time to get breakfast. I asked him what he wanted, but he did not go to work, and he then struck me a blow. The sergeant took hold of him by the collar, but, before I could say a word, all the prisoners, particularly Freeman, Jack, Downes, and Fowler, knocked me down with handspikes, belaying-pins, &c., and with their own fists struck me on the head. I managed to get away from them, having all the officers except the mate below, I ran aft to the wheel-house and got a revolving pistol. I went forward again, took hold of Freeman, held him by the prisoner, and ordered the others to go to work. They did so, but

DESTRUCTION OF LAGOS, ON THE WEST COAST OF AFRICA, BY THE BRITISH SQUADRON.

THE DESTRUCTION OF LAGOS.

WE have already detailed the British attack upon Lagos, the nest of the slave-trade in the Bights, and, as far as we know, on the west coast of Africa. We now engrave the scene of action, with an extract from a private letter from a Correspondent on board her Majesty's ship Penelope, describing the second day's attack.

The little Teazer got on shore the second time before she could take up the proper position; in an hour and a half from our starting we were snugly fast head and stern close to our little friend the Bloodhound, and then we began in right good earnest. The firing could not have been better directed on board the Excellent, in Portsmouth Harbour, and must have told fearfully on the devoted town. Captain Coote about this time came up in the Volcano with his boats, and entered con amore into the work of the day. At two one of our rockets set fire to the Marine Monarch's house, one of the largest in the place; and as we did not strike fire up for him with our shot and shell, it was no fault of mine. The roofs of the houses were all of reed and straw. A pleasant little sea breeze springing up at the time, and the rocket boat having made two or three lucky hits in other quarters, the whole town was soon in a blaze, and a famous bonfire it made, varied occasionally by the blowing up of their numerous powder-magazines. One of the Lavapoon's paddle-boats was on the point of starting for the ship with 23 of the worst cases of our numerous wounded when the flames burst forth, and our restorated cheers had the most renovating effect upon their spirits. The Waterwitch's boats also came up about this time, and did service; the result, however, would have been the same. The town burnt famously all night. On the following morning (Sunday) we did not fire a shot, and were surprised in the morning to see several detached houses set on fire. In the afternoon we received certain information that the King and everybody in the place had decamped, leaving us in quiet possession of the walls of the capital. Our African allies from Abiaunta and Badagry, amounting to about 700 men, and who had been very useful in protecting the left bank of the river, then crossed over, and took quiet possession as much plunder as they could collect.

Lagos is the finest African town I have ever seen. The houses are regularly and well built, and particularly clean in the inside. The poor inhabitants made haste to quit in the greatest possible confusion. It is difficult to form an estimate of the force opposed to us; they could not have amounted to less than 8000, and an equal number armed with other weapons. One of the chiefs told me he knew of 500 killed by our fires besides a great number wounded. I added on the Monday to have a look at the fortifications, which were wonderful y strong, and 300 resolute men could have defended them against any force.

THE METROPOLITAN RIFLE CLUB.

THIS Club, which appears to have taken the lead of the Rifle Clubs establishing in various parts of the country, has already a powerful body of volunteers, and a distinguished nobleman is about to take the command of it. The costume adopted by the corps, and of which we give an Engraving, is grey, faced with green. The sword is a bayonet-sword, that may be fixed at will to the rifle; and the rifle is to be on the latest improved principle. In the summer, gold medals will be awarded as prizes to the best marksmen; and it appears that at an early day the dress adopted by the corps will be scientifically examined in Hyde-park by high military authorities.

LAUNCH OF THE "COUNTESS OF ELLESMERE" STEAMER.

ON Monday last, a very beautiful iron steam-vessel, 170 feet long and 20 feet beam, was launched from Mr. Laird's building-yard, Birkenhead, for the Bridgewater trustees, to expedite and improve the passenger accommodation between Liverpool, Runcorn, Manchester, Northwick, &c.

The vessel was named the Countess of Ellesmere by Miss Laird, daughter of the builder, in the presence of the Hon. Captain Egerton, R.N., son of Lord Ellesmere; Mr. Loch, Mr. C. W. Williams, and a large number of gentlemen interested in steam navigation. This new steamer is divided into six water-tight compartments by iron bulkheads, and is completed in the strongest and most efficient manner, rendering her fit either for sea or river service. Her great length has enabled the builder to combine very fine lines with a draft of water not exceeding 4 feet, with passengers and stores on board; and on this draft she is expected to be the fastest vessel yet built on the Mersey.

The engines will shortly be put on board by Messrs. Fawcett, Preston, and are of 80-horse power (nominal), having tubular boilers, feathering floats, and all the latest improvements which experience has suggested for this class of vessel.

Another vessel has just been built by Mr. Laird, for the same enterprising parties, for the navigation of the river Weaver. She is called the Weaver, is 86 feet long, 14 feet beam, and 20-horse power, drawing only 3 feet 6 inches aft, and 2 feet 6 inches forward. Hitherto there has generally been a difficulty to obtain a result from screw-vessels of light draft; but in this case a speed of 10½ to 11miles per hour has been obtained, as proved by trials with other vessels, and at a measured distance.

On Monday she attended, and brought over from Liverpool to Birkenhead Captain Egerton, Mr. Loch, Mr. C. W. Williams, and other gentlemen; and after the launch they took a run in her on the river, to satisfy themselves as to her speed, which was undeniably proved by her passing easily the various ferry-boats, many of them having 60 and 70-horse power. The party landed in the afternoon at the George's Pier, highly delighted with their trip.

The result of the Weaver's trial may induce an extension of screw-steaming for many ports and coasts where 4 to 5 feet water is the most that can be permitted; and we noticed on the stocks at Mr. Laird's yard a vessel of this description, of about 150 tons and 40 horse-power, to carry a cargo on 4 feet draft, and to have at the same time a speed of 9 to 10 knots.

Mr. Thomson, surgeon, R.N., the inventor of the naval telegraphic lights, has submitted a plan to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty by which candles and oil may for ever be dispensed with, many thousands of pounds being saved to the country, and yet ten times more light secured to every ship afloat. Their Lordships have approved of the invention. The slush from the meat at noon is taken at night for light, where salted meats are used. Her Majesty's ship Impregnable, flag-ship, Devonport, is lighted from stem to stern with common tallow on this plan.

THE MINISTERIAL CHALLENGE TO THE COUNTRY.

In writing last week upon the subject of the Ministry, we were without precise information of their future policy. We were willing to echo the then popular sentiment—that they were the Ministers of necessity; and, as such, entitled to forbearance, or to something better—a respectful consideration. But they have since spoken. What was formerly doubtful has been made clear. They have abandoned the plea of their necessity, and stand upon [illegible] principle. The solemn inauguration of the Government, which took place on Monday night, will disappoint the hopes of those who accepted it on the first terms; and who made allowances for the difficult position in which its more prominent members were placed, as men whose pledges and past sayings pointed in one direction, but whose growing convictions and enlarged experience irresistibly led them in another. We confess to having been of the number of those who thought the Russell Administration an evil, and who were desirous that the new Ministry should not be factiously and prematurely opposed. We believed that Lord Derby, Mr. Disraeli, and its chief members were Protectionists only in name. We desired that, in default of the incompetent Ministry which preceded it, and which no one, not even its warmest friends, thought it worth while to save, Lord Derby should be allowed time to give the Corn-laws the go-by, and to attempt to govern the country upon the basis of Free Trade as an admitted and irreversible fact. But Lord Derby will not have it so; and the temper of the present Parliament, and of the country generally, as expressed within the last few days, seems to be disinclined to give him the trial which he asks at one moment and repels in another. The Whigs, under Lord John Russell, are so anxious to resume possession of the power which they so unwisely suffered to escape from their hands, that they will not look with patience at Lord Derby in Downing-street; and the extreme Democratic party are too glad of a pretext to renew popular agitation out of doors to allow even breathing-time to a retrograde party. The country, which prospers and has prospered under a Free-trade policy, and which well knows "the reason why," mistrusts Lord Derby's intentions, and believes him honourable and honest enough to attempt when in office to carry out the Protectionist principles with which, when out of office, his name was identified, and which, both directly and indirectly, have made him Prime Minister of England. Hence it has become next to impossible that the Administration of Lord Derby shall

Were his Lordship as wise as he is chivalrous, he would even now resign office. It is a great and worthy object of ambition to be Prime Minister of England; but it is a greater and worthier object of ambition, to be of service to one's country at a moment of perplexity and peril. Before the delivery of the speeches made by Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli on Monday evening, there was a hope that they might successfully and safely carry on the Government; but their own words have already sealed their downfal. A Government which not only does not deprecate, but positively invites a long and rancorous popular agitation, is an evil too great to be borne. No genius can make it endurable—no considerations of policy make it safe. Stripped of all unnecessary verbiage, denuded of all mystification, and put into plain English, the speech of Lord Derby says to the people of this great and prosperous country—"We think Free Trade a stupendous mistake. We think there ought to be a tax upon foreign corn, for the benefit of the English farmers. We think it would be our duty to propose some measure to that effect, if the country would endure it or allow us to do so; but, as we are not quite certain of the popular will, although we entertain tolerably strong opinions, we shall do nothing until the friends and foes of Free Trade have agitated the country from one end to the other. But, although the Protectionists may get a bare majority, we shall not be contented. We require a large, unmistakeable, and decisive majority; so prepare for the battle;—such a battle as this age has not seen, and in the meantime let us get through with other business and hold our places." Mr. Disraeli, in a speech [illegible] ing in the most ostentatious manner to be frank and c[illegible]ut which is distinguished by the total absence of frankness [illegible] dour, and which is nothing more than a paltry mystification from its first phrase to its last, points in the same direc[illegible] as his chief. We call upon all [illegible]

[illegible] interest; so that a Parliament may be retur[illegible] future period, which, whether in favour of Free Trade or of Protection, shall afford an excuse to the present Ministry for doing or for not doing a certain act, on which it is not even clear that it will go so far as to stake its existence. When Lord Derby and his lieutenant place the question before the country in this shape, it is impossible for any friend of Free Trade or of good government to remain quiescent. A battle is challenged, and it must be fought. But it is a most unhappy battle to be waged at any time; and, in the present circumstances of Europe and of the world, ought to have been especially avoided by every true friend of his country. The ultimate, if not the proximate, result is clearly foreknown. It can but end in one way; but in the progress of the struggle the country may chance to see many things swept away in the democratic storm, which it is desirable to preserve. Such a struggle, if carried on with the virulence which Lord Derby demands as essential, would not be a merely fiscal one, upon a miserable point of taxing the bread of the people, but would include and drag along with it our whole representative system. Nothing, in fact, could be more deplorable to Lord Derby and to England than such an overwhelming Parliamentary majority in favour of a Corn-law as he desires. It would be no other than the commencement of a great political revolution, the opening of which all might foresee, but of which none could foretell the close.

After such a challenge to the country as Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli have so unfortunately given, they cannot be surprised if the League—that powerful organisation which the sagacious mind of Sir Robert Peel saw to be so pregnant with danger to the country—should be fully revived. Indeed, it may confidently be predicted that the new League will surpass the old, not only in the vigour of its operations and the munificence of its exchequer, but in the comprehensiveness of its demands. The old League demanded nothing but the untaxed loaf. The new League will demand something more: and, what ought to have made Lord Derby pause ere he recalled it to life again, its ranks will be recruited by many who held aloof from the former confederation. The Whigs will not be its cold and uncertain allies as before, but will be incorporated and absorbed into it. This time it will include Parliamentary Reformers, as well as the eaters of cheap bread.

It will not serve the purpose of Lord Derby to assert, as he does, that he will ask the opinion of the country upon other points of policy at the same time. So his other measures as unexceptionable and praiseworthy as it is possible for measures to be, the real question to be decided will be, "Bread Tax" or "No Bread Tax." Whatever his Lordship adds to that question will be of no avail and of no importance, but whatever is added by his opponents will be of much avail and of the highest importance. Every day that such a Ministry remains in office after the declarations made in both Houses on Monday night, is a day of peril to its own reputation and to the future well-being of the country. To Lord Derby himself we conceive that nothing so fortunate could happen as his resignation. He claimed at first to be the Minister of necessity. If he had rested upon that claim he might have been gratefully endured for his destined period; but when he claims to be the Minister who is bound to ask the country to agitate for the restoration of an exploded system, and when he avows that he will restore that system if he can but get a Parliamentary majority large enough to work with, he abandons all that right to our sympathy which the first plea might have warranted. He is no longer the Minister of necessity, but of that far inferior thing, a fiscal injustice—against which the present Parliament has set its face, and against which he knows the next Parliament will also set its face, unless a general agitation is got up, which of itself will be one of the greatest calamities that could at the present time befall the British nation.

It is discreditable and disheartening to think that amid the mighty interests of civilisation, now struggling throughout Europe against an armed and relentless despotism, the greatest nation of the world should be engaged in a fierce and ignoble struggle of a section of the people to tax the bread of all. And what makes the struggle the more ignoble, is the fact that the very Ministers who are goading the nation to recommence it, betray in all their speeches that they have their misgivings of the result, and weigh their own miserable consistency against the welfare of the people. We must confess we had higher hopes of Lord Derby.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

SIR FREDERICK THESIGER, Q.C., M.P. for Abingdon, youngest and only surviving son of Charles Thesiger, Esq., who, in 1807, and for a long period of years, held the office of Collector of Customs in the island of St. Vincent, and nephew of Sir Frederick Thesiger, who acted as Aide-de-Camp to Lord Nelson at the battle of Copenhagen, and was sent with the flag of truce to the Crown Prince, was born in London on the 17th July, 1794. His first choice of a profession, made almost in childhood, was the navy; and he was entered as a Midshipman on board the Cambrian frigate, Captain the Hon. Charles Paget, and served with her at the bombard neat of Copenhagen in 1807.

On the death of his elder brother he retired from the navy, with the intention of being called to the Bar and proceeding to the West Indies, where he might at once practise his profession and superintend the management of the estate of which his father had some time previously become a purchaser, at St. Vincent. The opportunity, however, was not afforded him of carrying his intention into effect, for, on the night of the 1st of May, 1812, an eruption of the Soufrir Mountain totally annihilated the estate. It may give some idea of the fury of this unparalleled eruption, that the entire island of St. Vincent was more or less covered with ashes, stones, cinders, and lava; volcanoes were simultaneously open on ships at a great distance at sea: ashes fell upon the island of Barbadoes, and the roar of the volcano was heard at a distance of 300 miles. Compelled thus to rely solely upon his exertions, Sir Frederick Thesiger prosecuted his law studies with the utmost diligence was called to the Bar at Gray's-inn in the Michaelmas Term of 1818, and went the Home Circuit. He gradually won his way in the profession, and obtained a large practice, after the passing of the Reform Bill, before Parliamentary election committees. By 1834 he had become the leader of his Circuit, and had, in that year, his silk gown. He was soon engaged on every important election case, of which the most notable were the Hull Committee (of which Sir George Strickland was chairman) and the great Dublin case, in which Hamilton and West were the petitioners against the return of O'Connell and Ruthven. He conducted the committee for ninety days; and afterwards a commission for fourteen months in Dublin. Ruthven died during the progress of the investigation; and it finally resulted in the seating of Hamilton and West. In the February of 1840, Sir Thomas Wilde (now Lord Truro), then member for Newark, being appointed Solicitor-General, was opposed, on presenting himself for re-election, by Mr. Thesiger, who came forward at the earliest invitation of the Conservatives of the borough. The contest was one of the hottest, and the Solicitor-General only saved his seat by a majority of nine. In the following month, however, Mr. Thesiger was returned unopposed for Woodstock.

The Chinese war was just then being commenced, and the new member made his first speech in the House upon Sir James Graham's motion in condemnation of the war, and the Government were only saved by the unexpected support of Mr. O'Connell

At the general election in 1841 he was again returned for Woodstock without a contest.

In 1844 Sir William Follett was promoted to be Attorney-General. Mr. Thesiger succeeded him in the office of Solicitor, and retired from the representation of Woodstock. A month afterwards, however, he was returned without opposition for Abingdon. In 1845, on the death of Sir William Follett, Sir Frederick Thesiger became Attorney-General, and, again presenting himself to the electors of Abingdon, was opposed by General Caufield, whom he beat by a majority of thirty.

At the general election in 1847, Sir Frederick Thesiger had again a contest with the same opponent, whom he defeated but by a majority of two. There was a petition against the return, but it was not prosecuted.

As a member of the Peel Government, Sir Frederick Thesiger supported the policy of Free Trade; and on the question of the repeal of the Navigation Laws, and other subsequent commercial measures, he has neither voted nor spoken. During the progress of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill in the last session, Sir Frederick Thesiger took the lead in proposing amendments, and which he carried against the Government by considerable majorities—amongst them the clause empowering common informers to commence prosecutions under the act. He has also strenuously, on all occasions, opposed the alterations of the Parliamentary oaths, and the admission of Jews to Parliament; and at every stage of the measure has resisted, to the utmost speech on that side, every bill for the legalisation of marriage with a deceased wife's sister.

Amongst the numerous cases which have passed through Sir F. Thesiger's hands, the most extraordinary was the celebrated breach of promise case tried in the Queen's Bench from the 14th to the 18th of February, 1846, and the speech on the defendant's case in which was considered one of the ablest ever delivered by the learned Attorney-General, and full of instruction to all students for the Bar for its thorough and searching investigation of every point and incident of the adverse evidence; the speech, in fact, scarcely left need for any evidence from the defendant, and the pre-made case of the plaintiff crumbled away in the hands of the advocate into the dust of a wilfully and wickedly conspired romance.

The right hon. gentleman married, in the March of 1822, Anna Maria, youngest daughter of William Tinling, Esq., of Southampton, and niece of Major Pierson, who fell in defence of Jersey, in the attack by the French in 1781.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL.

SIR FITZROY KELLY, eldest son of Robert Hawke Kelly, a Captain in the army, by Isabel, daughter of Captain Fordyce, carver and cup-bearer to George III., and grandson of the Colonel Robert Kelly who greatly distinguished himself in the East Indies, was born at London in 1796. His education was commenced at the school of a Mr. Elliott, at Bethnal-green; and he was subsequently sent to an academy at Chelsea, on quitting which he studied for two or three years without assistance, and in 1816 was appointed to an office in the Paymaster-General's department at Chelsea Hospital, under Sir Charles Long. So occupied, he remained until 1818, when he commenced in earnest to study for the profession under Mr. Thomas Abraham, then a pleader, and afterwards distinguished at the common law bar. In 1821 Mr. Kelly entered upon practice as a special pleader, and in the May of 1824 was called to the Bar. A fellow-student had just contested the borough of Rosney, now no longer in existence, and on petition against the return, placed the brief in Mr. Kelly's hands. Fortunately for him he had the opening speech to make; and, though it was his first, he spoke for upwards of six hours, and so established his ability that other election petitions were soon placed in his hands. He was shortly afterwards engaged in the celebrated Bethnal-green controversies, with which he had made acquaintance whilst practising as a pleader. He joined, immediately on being called the Home Circuit, and went it in the summer of 1824 and spring of 1825, but in the summer of 1825 he changed to the Norfolk Circuit. He had then no connexion, no local or professional interest to give him an introduction to Parliament, and was poor, and was returned; but, on petition, the former members were declared duly elected. At the general election in 1837 he once more tried the borough the third time with Mr. Milner Gibson. At the close of the poll the numbers were—Gibson, 601; Tufnell, 595; Kelly, 593: Wason, 592. On petition, Mr. Kelly was seated in the place of Tufnell. The seat, however, proved not to have been worth the contest, for in 1841 he was again beaten, and remained out of Parliament until 1843, when the appointment of Sir Alexander Grant to a Commissionership of Excise caused a vacancy in the representation of Cambridge, for which he became a candidate, and, after a hot contest with Mr. Foster, he was returned. In 1845 he was appointed Solicitor-General, and on standing for re-election was opposed by Mr. Shafto Adair, who won the seat at the general election in 1847, when Sir Fitzroy Kelly stood for Lyme Regis, which he lost by three votes—the numbers being Ahdy, 148; Kelly, 145.

To enumerate the cases in which Sir Fitzroy Kelly has been in the course of his professional career engaged, would be to go through every important cause in the reports. Before obtaining his silk gown he was in the great Liverpool toll case, involving an income of upwards of £100,000, and in the Leigh peerage before the Lords. He argued the law point which saved Frost's life; and, as counsel for O'Connell in the Peers, obtained the reversal of the judgment of the Irish courts.

In office, Sir Fitzroy Kelly supported the Free-trade measures of Sir Robert Peel; and whilst previously in Parliament, and not in office, he devoted himself to the reform of the criminal code; and, supported out of doors by the incessant anxious efforts of John Barry, of Plough-court, and the Anti-Capital Punishment Society, he succeeded in putting an end to the punishment of death for all crimes but four, and he is now engaged in accomplishing the abolition of those. He has also, on every occasion, opposed the claim of the House to any privilege overriding the courts of law, and was counsel against Parliament in the case of Stockdale v. Hansard, and the subsequent case of the Sheriffs of London, &c

The last great case in which, previous to his acceptance of office, he was engaged was that argued last term in the Exchequer in support of the right of the Jews to sit in Parliament upon taking the abjuration oath omitting the words "upon the true faith of a Christian." And the general opinion seems to be, that the decision of the judges upon the argument, even if they be equally divided, cannot but settle the question for ever in favour of the right of Jews to take the oath in the form they hold most binding on their consciences, and to sit as representatives in the House

At present, the Solicitor-General, in concert with his legal colleagues, has in preparation Bills for Chancery Reform, Reform of Common-law Procedure, Improved Administration of Charitable Bequests, and Reform of the Patent Laws; and it was with a view to these measures that the Earl of Derby wished to include in his Ministry the present law advisers of the Crown, who, having held office under Sir R. Peel, had no expectation of it under the present Administration.

The right honourable gentleman married, in the March of 1821, the eldest daughter and co-heir of Captain Mason, of Leith, descended on her mother's side from the Mackenzies of Suddie and Scatwell, Ross-shire.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

In the Westminster Police-court, on Saturday last, a man of the name of Felix M'Gee, a general dealer in tools and furniture, and the proprietor of a shop in Cartaret-street, Westminster, was remanded upon the charge of feloniously discharging a loaded horse-pistol at Michael Collins, a coppersmith, and severely wounding him in several parts of his body. It appeared that both Collins and his assailant were members of the "Westminster and Pimlico Progressive Tradesmen Society," and a dispute arising respecting the right of possession to the house 27, York-street, Westminster, which a deal taken for the purposes of the society, the prisoner committed the offence in seeking exclusive possession of the aforesaid premises. The wounded man is likely to recover.

In the case of Woodfall v. Mayhew, an application was made on Tuesday, in Vice Chancellor Sir James Parker's court, for an injunction to restrain the defendants, Mr. Henry Mayhew and Mr. John Howdon, from collecting or receiving any sums of money due from any purchasers of a work, called "London Labour and the London Poor," printed by the plaintiff; and also from interfering with the numbers printed by the plaintiff which remained unsold. An application was also made for the appointment of a receiver, to collect the sums due for the numbers sold, and to take possession of and sell such of the numbers of the work as remained unsold. The work in question had been printed by the plaintiff, and it appeared that there was an agreement between the parties, by which the plaintiff was to have an account of the sales made up by Mr. Howden; and the bill alleged that there had been a breach of the agreement in that respect, and that Mr. Mayhew had not assisted him in enforcing his right. The defendants, not appearing, an order was made in the terms prayed by the notice of motion.

A bill was presented on Tuesday for abolishing the office of Pursuivant to the Great Seal, the duties of such office being merged in those of the Serjeant-at-Arms. Writs for the election of representative Peers, and of members of Parliament, &c., are to be sent by post, and in addition is to be made to the salary of the messenger in the Crown-office for the extra duty to be imposed upon him by these changes. Compensation is to be made to Mr. Rugway, the Pursuivant to the Great Seal, for the loss of his sinecure.

At the Lincoln Assizes, on Tuesday week, Mr. Justice Maule, feeling incommoded from the want of proper ventilation in a crowded court, and becoming impatient at the windows not being opened as he desired, peremptorily ordered the glass in them to be smashed. His Lordship's order was duly executed.

On Tuesday Mr. Wakley held an inquest at the Royal Free Hospital, Gray's-inn road, on the body of Lady Elizabeth Graham, who dislocated her neck by falling down a stone staircase on Friday week; and another on H. F. Fry, the artist who was killed by falling from a scaffold at the Colosseum. In both cases the jury returned verdicts of "Accidental death."

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The decrees which have been substituted for Legislative enactments by the "Prince President" since the establishment of the new order of things, have this week taken finance as their subject; and, accordingly, on Sunday, a decree appeared in the Moniteur, converting the Five per Cent. Rentes into Four-and-a-Half per Cent. Rentes, the conditions attached to the measure being that all rentiers who objected to the conversion should be reimbursed at the rate of 100 francs for every five francs of rentes; and that the demand of reimbursement must be made within twenty days from the date of the decree. That delay extends to two months for rentiers residing out of France, that is, in Europe and Algeria; and to one year for those out of Europe. No legitimate objection exists to the measure, except the sudden and absolutist manner in which it has been effected, and that the hospitals and other benevolent institutions, whose funds were invested in these rentes, will lose by it about one-tenth of their incomes arising from that source. These corporations have addressed a petition to the President on the subject, but it is not expected they will, or, in fact, can obtain any redress in the matter. Their total loss will amount to about 1,200,000 francs a year by the conversion. The whole amount of rentes affected by the decree is 187,184,621f., representing a capital of 4,000,000,000f., and the saving to be effected by the State will amount to 18,000,000f. Several of the small fund holders, who form the great body of these rentiers, are much dissatisfied, more from ignorance of the character of the measure then from any other cause, for they commend it with such proceedings as the spoliation decree affecting the Orleans property.

On Thursday the Moniteur published the estimates for 1852. The State expenditure is calculated at 1,430,363,344 francs; the receipts at 1,445,415,656. The import duties on fermented liquors are reduced by half, and those on liquors sold by retail raised by half. The war estimates are increased 7,000,000 francs; those of the navy by 12,000,000 francs. The extraordinary works are augmented by 14,000,000 francs.

"The Sovereignty of the people" has been ignored this week by Louis Napoleon, who has issued a decree directing that all public documents shall in future be headed, "Louis Napoleon, President of the French Republic," instead of, as hitherto, "In the name of the French people." Corps Legislatif for the fourth electoral district of Paris, by a majority of 3410 votes over his competitor, M. Moreau, the Government candidate: the number for the former being 16,753, for the latter, 13,3 .

The Journal des Debats has commenced the publication of the different documents connected with the confiscation of the Orleans property, it being understood that the Government allows publicity on the [illegible] of its opponents. Among these documents is a family contract, entitled "Contrat de Mariage et d'Association," by MM. Odilon Barrot, Dufaure, and Paillet, the eminent counsel, who have been consulted as to the legal character and bearing of the second of the confiscation decrees, and have pronounced the following opinion:—

1st. That when the decrees of the 22d January were published, the Princes the Duke of Orleans were peremptorily proprietors of the property which forms the object of the second of these decrees. 2d. That this decree cannot deprive the Orleans family of the property in question. 3d. That time decree does not form any obstacle to the question of the property between the state and the Orleans family, and all necessary contests which may be attached to it, from being brought before the tribunals.

These propositions are supported by learned arguments, and reasons apparently well founded.

The grand review which was to take place on the 15th of April, for the distribution of colours to the army, is postponed to the 1st of May. The whole of the army of Paris is to be present, as well as the National Guards, mounted and on foot.

For some time past there has been a misapprehension respecting the late severe affixing English newspapers, which it was supposed interdicted in future all such periodicals. This, it appears, however, is not the case, as those journals are admitted as heretofore; but the difference is, that they are now charged 12c. extra for the privilege.

Amongst the decrees published in the Moniteur during the week is one for a new organisation of the Legion of Honour. The President of the Republic declares himself to be its chief and Grand Master. There are to be a great many new formalities, and the admissions into the order are to be on a more restricted scale than hitherto.

GERMAN STATES.

From Berlin, under date the 14th inst., we learn that in a very large number of districts, both in North and South Germany, especially at Posen, Westphalia, the Tyrol, Greis, Cassel, &c., and in Sweden, the sufferings of the poor, in consequence of the failure of the potato crop and the dearth of grain, are excessive. A famine would appear imminent. In Posen there are regular bands of robbers, driven on by hunger, so that cavalry are obliged to patrol the roads to protect travellers from attack. In Westphalia, beans boiled with roots have superseded bread and potatoes with the poor. In Wermeland and Oestland (Sweden) whole districts have already been laid to straw and the bark of trees for food. In Naumberg a mother has drowned her two daughters, and then herself, in despair at the approach of starvation. In the neighbourhood of Danzig the failure of the potato crop has induced several landlords to turn their attention to the so-called Russian potato, which is at present very little cultivated here: it is said to contain from 30 to 36 per cent. more saccharine matter than beet-root. If true, this would be worth the attention of the company about to manufacture beet-root sugar in Ireland.

The Royal family of Prussia have received invitations from the Emperor of Russia to be present at the solemnisation to be observed at Moscow this year, in honour of the thousandth anniversary of the foundation of the Russ an Empire.

From Vienna, under date the 12th inst., it is announced that, in consequence of a despatch having been received from the Government in England, making declarations respecting the political refugees of a character precisely analogous to the views expressed by the Earl of Derby in the House of Lord-, the Austrian Government has determined not to pursue in the exceptional measures which it had intended to adopt towards English travellers in Austria.

UNITED STATES.

The Senate at Washington has been engaged, since our last notice of proceedings in Congress, in a long discussion on a motion for an adjournment of the House in connexion with the pending application for an increased grant of money to the Collins line of mail steamers, the object of the adjournment being to allow the members to inspect the Collins steamer Baltic, which had steamed up the Potomac to Washington. The motion was carried by a small majority.

At the latest dates (viz. New York, the 2d inst.), intelligence had been received from the Salt Lake, of a terrible revolution having occurred there. The Mormons were arming and fortifying themselves, and had published a declaration of independence, in which they asserted their full determination to set up a republic for themselves. The people of the district freely declared their hatred of the general government of the United States, and were preparing to resist all authority from without by fortifying their settlement. The United States territorial officers had all left.

Kansas in the latest news is to Feb. 2. A special message has been delivered to the Legislature by Governor Bigler, directing attention to the embarrassed condition of the finances, and suggesting measures for their relief. The election of United States Senator has resulted in the election of John B. Weller. Colonel Fremont, with his family, is about to take passage for Europe.

In the mines much inconvenience and want had been experienced by failure of the water supplies. Diggings had not been very brisk, and prospecting parties have made but few rich discoveries within the preceding month. The gold dust brought by the mail from San Francisco to New York was of the value of 1,432,000 dollars. A Dr. Spooker is said to have discovered a solvent which will prove of great benefit in separating the particles of gold from black sand. It is added that he had succeeded in obtaining gold in considerable quantities where quicksilver had failed to obtain a single grain.

According to accounts from Panama the emigration to California is immense. It was estimated that 7000 persons were en route between Panama and San Francisco. Cholera had appeared in Panama and on the Isthmus, awaiting conveyance to the land of promise.

THE RIVER PLATE.

THE South American mails bring intelligence of much interest and importance this week from the united territories and confederated states on the banks of the River Plate, which have hitherto yielded to the despotism of Rosas, the Dictator of Buenos Ayres, but which have for the last four or five months, aided by the active co-operation of a Brazilian force been engaged in a fierce contest with the troops of the Dictator, in defence of their freedom, and for the recovery of those rights of independent action, as sovereign states, which the grasping ambition of Rosas had wrested from them for the aggrandisement, first of himself, and next of his capital, Buenos Ayres, to the complete annihilation of the commerce and prosperity of all the confederated states known as the Banda Oriental, and in an especial manner of their great natural out-port, the city of Monte Video.

This intelligence announces the downfal of Rosas, and the overthrow of his army by the allied troops under Urquiza.

The latest date from Monte Video is the 5th of February; and from the advices we learn that Urquiza's army commenced the passage of the river Parana on the 23d of December, and completed it on the 8th of January. The army, said to consist of 24,000 men, and 40 pieces of artillery, with the necessary baggage. On the morning of the 3d of February, the combined Oriental and Brazilian forces, under the command of Urquiza, came in sight of the enemy, and an engagement of considerable action took place at a locality between Merlo and the Passo del Rey, which terminated in the defeat of the Buenos Ayrean troops. The battle commenced at six o'clock in the morning, and ended at ten A.M. It is said 4000 men were killed and wounded in this engagement, and that the Holstein cavalry, in the Brazilian service, literally rode over the much-vaunted cavalry of the Dictator of the Argentine Republic, who was present during the action, and received a wound in the hand. General Pacheco commanded the Buenos Ayrean army, and is reported to have been slain. During the night of the 3d General Urquiza slept at the country residence of General Rosas, at Palermo, and took up his headquarters there, previous to marching upon Buenos Ayres. Rosas, with his daughter Manuelita and several of his suite, escaped on board her Majesty's ship Locust. He was disguised as a marine, and his daughter as a sailor boy; they were afterwards transferred to her Majesty's ship Centaur, at Buenos Ayres. The city was commanded by General Manadilla, who offered to capitulate. The diplomatic agents of the various foreign powers had gone to arrange matters amicably, if possible.

We regret to state that Mr. Payne, Master of her Majesty's ship Locust, who rode out to see the battle of the 3d, was met by some Gauchos retreating, who demanded his horse, and, on his refusing to give it up, they took it from him, and wounded him so severely that he died in consequence.

WEST INDIES.

From Jamaica, advices dated Feb. 10 notice the existence of reports in the island that instructions had been received from England by the managers of estates to abandon the cultivation of sugar, and the best estates, unless they can grow and manufacture sugar at £3 per hogshead, and rum at £6 per puncheon, which has, by a minute and searching inquiry a few years ago before the Committee of the House of Assembly, been proved to be utterly impossible. Moreover the wages of the negroes have ... the cholera increased one-fourth, adding to the distress of the unfortunate planters. It has been found necessary that £20,000 of the British Government loan of £100,000 for immigration should be appropriated to the exportation of the Coolies.

On the 13th of January Vera Cruz was visited by most violent northern gales, such as had not been known there for many years. Of 22 ships that were in the port, 14 were driven from their anchors and lost. Only 15 lives were lost, but goods to a large amount were destroyed, and the Mexican Government lost by this disaster duties to the amount of 200,000 dollars, and the bondholders their proportion of the same.

From Mexico it is announced that the revolution has been suppressed on the northern frontier, but Carvajal was endeavouring to assemble some followers at Brownsville, on the left bank of the Rio Bravo.

INDIA.

We have advices by the usual semi-monthly express, in anticipation of the Overland Mail. The dates are Calcutta, February 8; and Bombay, February 17.

From Rangoon, the theatre of the recent hostilities with the Burmese, there is no further news of importance. Active operations were suspended for the present; but in the interval, owing to the state of the weather, reinforcements are constantly being despatched by the Government at Calcutta to the frontier, ready to repel any assault or injustice that might be attempted. The Burmese authorities appeared to be watching the course of events, and waiting to see what line of action would be adopted by the British Government. The Governor-General, who arrived at Calcutta on the 29th of January, is said to have approved generally of the conduct of the Commodore (Lambert) in the late operations at Rangoon, but excepted to the abduction of the Burmese ship-of-war. It now appears, however, that it was not on this account that the war with the Burmese Governor of Martaban and the state of the interior was attempted to remove British property from Rangoon he would be assailed from the stockades; and the commodore replied, that if so much as a pistol were discharged at him he would level the stockades; and he succeeded in the entire destruction of them. The Governor-General is said to be most anxious to see and bring the Burmese to their senses without resorting to hostilities, and to avoid a war if possible; and it is added that he entertains hopes of succeeding by means of a strict blockade of the river at Rangoon.

The expedition against Khyrpore is at an end. Ali Moorad, the Ameer, at once succumbed to the force sent out, and the troops were ordered back to their cantonments. The object of the expedition was to dispossess Ali Moorad of a vast extent of territory which he had obtained by means of a forged document, which gave him claim to the Khan-ship, or chieftainship. He admitted the fraud, and he is now reduced to the rank of a nobleman in the possession of hereditary estates.

At Peshawur the state of matters created some uneasiness, as the hillmen, who were in considerable force, had assumed a threatening appearance.

All other parts of India were tranquil.

CHINA.

The accounts from Hong-Kong are to the 20th of January. From the British community there is no news of interest. With respect to the defeat of the pirate junks which we noticed in our last as having taken place at Hong-Kong, we learn that Lieutenant Wilson, of the Royal Engineers, and the two gunners, who were in a precarious state, are quite out of danger, and recovering rapidly.

Under the head of domestic intelligence, we find the emigration of Chinese to Caliornfia noticed as being greatly on the increase. During the month six vessels had sailed, ten were preparing to leave, and more were required. Many who had previously emigrated have returned with substantial proofs of their success, and the Chinese are slow in following the example of their countrymen when money is the inducement.

The Kwangsi rebellion was not yet put down. Seu, Governor of Canton, had invited all loyal subjects to come forward with their contributions to defray the military expenses of the expedition.

In the neighbourhood of Shanghai a large piratical fleet was hovering about, and caused much apprehension to the people and Government of that district. The Manadarins and the chief of the pirates had an interview, but negotiations were broken off in consequence of the latter refusing to show the respect due to the Governor of the district. Her Majesty's brig Contest, at the request of the Chinese authorities, was stationed at Ningpo; and, subsequently, her Majesty's steamer Sphynx proceeded to relieve the Contest, and to render such assistance as might be necessary.

THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES.—TRANSPORTATION.

On Wednesday, a large deputation of mercantile and other gentlemen connected with the Australian colonies had an interview with the Right Hon. Sir J. Pakington, at the Colonial Office, on the subject of transportation. There were present, Mr. Mowbray, Mr. Ewart, M.P., Mr. Adderley, M.P., Mr. Chisholm Anstey, M.P., and the followinggentlemen, representing the four colonies of New South Wales, Van Diemen's Land, Victoria, and South Australia:—Messrs. R. Brooks, G. M'Lachlan, E. Gorn, W. Jackson, D. Kennedy, G. H. Donaldson, W. Fanning, A. Michie, W. Walker, J. A. Jackson, T. S. Atkins, J. C. Kung, G. Morphett, — Bolton, and James Alexander.

Sir W. Mowbray, after introducing the members of the deputation to the right hon. gentleman, said they sought the interview in consequence of having heard that several ships containing convicts were about to sail for Hobart Town; and they would respectfully request Sir J. Pakington to stop the convict vessels, not to transport any more convicts to Van Diemen's Land, in opposition to the wishes of the inhabitants of that and the other Australian colonies, and in violation of the promise of the British Government, that transportation to Van Diemen's Land should be abolished. Large meetings had been held in these colonies, and several petitions had been forwarded to this country on the subject. The Australian colonies were on the eve of becoming potent states; their inhabitants were inclined to be thoroughly attached and devotedly loyal to the British empire, but the continuation of transportation would soon destroy those feelings of attachment and loyalty

Mr. Ewart, M.P., Mr. Adderley, M.P., Mr. Anstey, M.P., and other gentlemen having severally spoken upon the subject, Sir J. Pakington, in reply, expressed his gratification at listening to the statements of so many gentlemen so well qualified to express their opinions on the very important subject of transportation, and with which there was no person better acquainted than the hon. Baronet Sir William Molesworth. He had himself devoted much attention, as a matter of duty, to the consideration of the subject of penal discipline, though not, he confessed to transportation in particular. With respect to the report of five convict vessels being ordered for Van Diemen's Land, there was a mistake in this; four only were under orders, and this, he understood, was from a misadventure on the part of the noble Lord, his predecessor. He (Sir John) had already arranged for diverting one of those vessels to another direction, and he hoped to do so with another. As regarded the alleged breach of faith, it was clear he (Sir John) was not responsible on this head. He could assure the gentlemen present, that the importance of the subject of transportation was duly appreciated by them, and would receive their most serious attention. He would, however, state a few facts, as he found them on his accession to office Western Australia petitioned for convicts, and the settlers in Moreton Bay petitioned for them, and sought separation from New South Wales for the purpose of receiving convicts. A petition had lately been received from 144 landholders in Van Diemen's Land, praying the continuance of a modified system of transportation. He merely stated these as facts, not denying that there was undoubtedly a very great feeling of opposition to the continuance of transportation. Then, he would ask whether the objection to transportation did not rather apply to the system as it formerly existed than to the present system? As regarded, at once meeting the wishes of the gentlemen present, he thought they would see, so recent as was his accession to office, that it would be impossible at present to do more than assure them how fully he entered into the early attention, and that he was much indebted to the gentlemen present for express ng their views respecting it.

Sir W. Molesworth, on the part of the deputation, having thanked the right hon. Baronet for his courtesy of his reception, the gentlemen retired.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

SEARCH FOR SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.—On Saturday last, the small screw-steamer, fitted out by Captain Beatson, departed in search of the missing Arctic expedition by the way of Behring's Straits, towards Kellett's line of traverse in 1849, Herald and Plover. Captain Beatson takes out autograph letters from the Emperor of Russia, recommending the expedition to the commanders of the Russian outposts at Siberia and other places within their districts, and desiring them to promote the object in view by co-operation to the uttermost of their power.

THE MARINE SOCIETY.—The anniversary festival of this society was held on Tuesday evening, at the London Tavern; the Right Hon. the Earl of Hardwick, Capt. R.N., in the chair, supported by Lieut.-General Sir James Lushington, G.C.B., Captain Jordan, &c. Nearly 100 gentlemen sat down to dinner. The report stated that since the formation of the society, in 1756, (a period of five years more than the century), 49,414 boys fitted out and provided for in the Royal Navy, the Hon East India Company's Indian Navy, and the Mercantile Marine. There are also 2,250 landsmen in various branches of the service. It was given (on condition of their serving on board ships in the Royal Navy), from the first establishment of the institution down to the year 1814. During the past year 1,900 boys had been placed in the different branches mentioned. On the 31st December, 1851, 115 boys remained on board the society's ship. They are instructed both in religious and moral duties. The receipts of the society from January 1st to December 31st, 1851, were £7303, on which there remained a balance of £916. In the course of the evening the noble chairman affectionately and forcibly addressed the fine healthy-looking troop of boys (who were permitted to enter the room) upon the duties they would have to perform, and upon the advantages resulting from a conscientious performance of those duties. He said that a Marine Militia for national defences might be formed out of this Society, with which the Government would gladly confer. The list of subscriptions, which included 100 guineas from the Queen, 100 guineas from the East India Company, 50 guineas from the Trinity House, and 12 guineas from the noble chairman of the evening, amounted in all to £647, being £500 more than last year.

By intelligence just received from Malta, we are informed that the Ardent, steam-packet, Lieut. Commander Derriman, in tow of the Spitfire, 6 steam sloop, Commander G. Parker, arrived from the Levant. The Ardent had a narrow escape from destruction, after breaking her intermediate shaft, for the current was fast setting her on to a ledge of rocks, with only nine feet of water, and the sea running mountains high. Lieut. Derriman, with coolness, got the accident to suspend his voyage, kept his ship to her work, and only when no other course was open to him, lay to under his mainstormsail, and really bore up for the Bay of Agincourt. Here, too, was a fine opportunity for the display of manly dash dragged. Lieut. Derriman's position was so precarious, it is said, that, had the accident happened an hour before, the ship and all hands must have been destroyed.

Jackman, captain of the mainstop, fell from the top to the deck, on board the Arethusa at Portsmouth, where he was so much injured that he was taken away insensible to the hospital at Haslar, with very little hope of his surviving.

The Duke of Northumberland's second captain's appointment has been given to Captain Granville Gower Loch, C.B. (1841), who has been selected to succeed Captain Wolfe Murray, C.B., Strathnairn—it is said, as flag-ship for the East Indies, to relieve the Hastings, 72.

RIFLE CANNON.—On Tuesday experiments were made in Woolwich Marshes with rifle cannon, in presence of Colonel H. W. Douglas, Colonel Dundas, C.B., Colonel J. R. Chalmer, Colonel Brereton, C.B., R.H., Colonel Blanchard, C.B., Royal Engineers; Lieutenant-Colonel Bell, Royal Horse Artillery; Lieutenant Colonel Anderson, Royal Artillery; Brigade Major Walpole, Royal Engineers, and Captain Tyndall, Deputy-Assistant Quartermaster-General of Artillery, with a number of officers of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers. The experiments were made with a 9-pounder field battery gun, rifled with five grooves, firing conical shot or shells of galvanised iron. The 9-pounder was stationed at 1000 yards from the target, and the shot, although nearly twice the weight, owing to its elongated shape, did not require more than half the charge in the gun, previously supplied with only two pounds of powder, the previously reduced service-charge of guns of that calibre being two pounds eight ounces. After wasting a considerable time to obtain a direct range, there being a great number of vessels passing, an opportunity of firing was obtained, and the conical shot entered the butt a little on the east side of the target, having been carried the entire distance with the small charge of powder, and an elevation of the gun of one and three-fourth degrees. The gun was again loaded with a similar charge of powder and shot, but it was nearly an hour before it could be fired, as so many vessels continued coming up and down the river. The 9-pounder having been elevated to two degrees, on being fired, the shot was carried over the butt, and the long gis ance between it and the river, and over the river into the Essex marshes. The range continuing to be interrupted by the vessels passing on the river, the 9-pounder was turned round, and the third round with which it had been loaded fired into the bank of one of the ditches in the marsh, from which it was extracted next morning, having entered fourteen feet into the solid earth, and to a depth of nine feet from the surface. The gun did not appear to be in the least injured by the firing, and consequently sufficient confidence in the depôt at Enfield in making rifle cannon and shot and shells to fit, by Colonel Dundas, Inspector of Artillery.

A number of gentlemen connected with metropolitan rifle clubs attended in the course of the morning, to try several descriptions of rifles, previous to deciding on the description of arm they will adopt in their corps.

FURTHER PRACTICE WITH THE MINIE RIFLES.—The authorities at the Horse Guards have decided on supplying each of the latter rifle regiments of several other line regiments in addition to those that previously sent parties to Woolwich for the purpose of being instructed by Major Brownrigg, at the Greenwich Marshes, in the use of the Minie rifle. Orders have received orders at the head quarters or depôts of the regiments to which they belong to proceed to Woolwich, for the purpose of being instructed by Major Brownrigg in the use of the new rifle:—1st Foot, 2d battalion, from head-quarters at Cork; 4th Foot, from head-quarters at Ashton; 19th Foot, from head-quarters at Chatham; 74th Foot, from head-quarters at Dublin; 21st Foot, from head-quarters at Hull; 26th Foot, from the depôt at Newport; 27th Foot, from head-quarters at Dublin; 28th Foot, from head-quarters at Newcastle; 33d Foot, from head-quarters at Colchester; 37th Foot, from the depôt at the Isle of Wight; 39th Foot, from head-quarters at Dublin; 42d (Highlanders), from the depôt at Aberdeen; Royal Marines, from the Chatham Division; 50th Foot, from head-quarters at Fermoy; 57th Foot, from the depôt at Bristol; 58th Foot, from the depôt at Canterbury; 62d Foot, from head-quarters at Dublin; 65th Foot, from the depôt at Canterbury; 69th Foot, from the depôt at Chatham; 79th (Cameron Highlanders), from the head-quarters at Edinburgh Castle; 81st Foot, from head-quarters at Dublin; 90th Foot, from headquarters at Cork; 93d (Highlanders), from head-quarters at Weedon. There will be one officer and two non-commissioned officers from each of the above regiments.

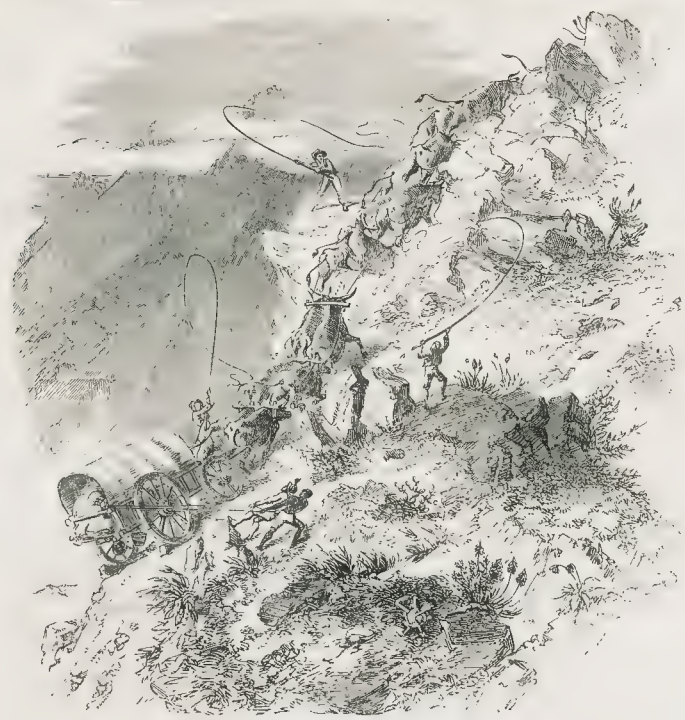
AGRICULTURAL IMPROVEMENTS IN PRUSSIA.—The Berlin Correspondent of the Times mentions that an Austrian exhibition is to be opened at Breslau next May, in a Crystal Palace on a reduced scale. "The visits of so many enlightened Prussians to London last summer has brought about a wonderful activity on the part of Government for the promotion of agricultural improvements. A great number of machines for the use of agriculture, which were purchased by the Government in London, are now being exhibited here; and there are to be cattle shows and exhibitions, wool in its various stages, flax from the earliest stalk to the latest form of improved linen, in various parts of the kingdom. The Prussian exhibitors at the Crystal Palace, who have now got their articles returned unsold on their hands, are about to get up an exhibition of them here, in the hopes of catching customers for them when the Court is graced in the next month by the presence of so many august visitors."

A letter from an Austrian officer, who has recently entered the Persian service, states that the present Shah, who is only 23 years of age, is one of the finest men in the empire. His great-grandfather had 800 wives and an immense number of children, who, in their turn, have had so many descendants, that it is calculated that the imperial family now reckons at least 10,000 individuals.

MUTINY AND MASSACRE ON BOARD TWO BRITISH SHIPS.

By overland mail from India accounts have been received this week giving details of the massacre of the commanders and portions of the crews of the British Victory, of London, and Herald, of Leith.

The Victory was the property of Messrs. Cook and Wilson, shipowners, of Dockhead, Bermondsey. She was a barque of 579 tons burden, commanded by Mr. William Lennox Mullens; and, having sailed to some Chinese port, was chartered to convey Coolies to Callao. It appears that on the 6th of December, she sailed from Cumsingmoon with upwards of 300 Coolies on board and a general cargo. On the afternoon of the 10th, between three and four o'clock, the Coolies made a rush into the cabin, and with little difficulty possessed themselves of the ship's arms. The slaughter then commenced. At that moment Mr. Mullens was walking the poop, and, in order that he should have no opportunity of defeating their object, a party of them was sent to seize him. One of the crew, a brave fe low of the name of Henry Watt, seeing the defenceless position of the master, made towards him, and endeavoured to protect him. The effort, however, quickly ended in his life being ta... several of the wretches rushed at him with merciless fur... threw the mutilated body overboard. Mr. Mullens got up into the m... ging. He was followed by one of them, armed with a cutlass, and even only the master slid down one of the topmost back-stays. The moment he had reached the deck, a number of the infuriated Coolies began cutting at him with their cutlasses, and after having him with heavy iron bolts, and finding that they had accomplished his death, they dropped his remains overboard. Resistance was now ess. Mr. Fagg, the chief mate, had gone aloft on the foremast-yard, believing that he could there be safe; but the second mate, James Kearns, and the cook, Mr. Bailey, encountered the Coolies somewhere on the forepart of the ship, and were murdered by them. Believing that they had overcome all probable resistance they seized Mr. Fagg, and threw him to some down. He did so, and some of the Coolies who had taken an active part in the massacre led him to the wheel, and by signs directed him to steer for the land, on pain of being put to death if he made any attempt to deviate from the course. He did so, and reached the coast, a few of the fellows put off to the land, but, reporting it inhabited, they returned on board. They then endeavoured to beat up the coast to Cochin China, but that being difficult, they bore away for Pulo Ubi, where the ship was ultimately brought to an anchor. During this cruising they took every precaution to ... ...



WAGGON ASCENDING THE UNCOMMOSS HILL, NATAL.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

THE advices received this week by the regular monthly mail steamship confirm the satisfactory account of the improved state of matters at the seat of war which we noticed last week, as conveyed by a casual channel of communication. The date of the latest intelligence is the 3d ult., at which date the operations of the troops had been so successful against the Kaffirs, that at Cape Town it was not deemed too sanguine to regard the speedy termination of the war as certain, and anticipate that little would have been left by Sir Harry Smith for his successor, General Cathcart, to do, but to hail the victorious and final close of this protracted and harassing contest.

The details of the preceding month's operations notice the capture of extensive herds of cattle by the divisions under General Somerset and Colonel Eyre, as had been previously announced. Those troops returned about the 11th of January to head-quarters; and simultaneously Sandilli, Macomo, Mapassa, and other Kaffir chiefs, sued for peace, on which Sir Harry Smith informed their councillors that he would accede to their request, and spare their lives, on the terms of their unconditional surrender. These terms they hesitated to accept, when on the 18th his Excellency the Governor informed them that they should have seven days to consider, and if they did not consent, the whole of his forces should enter upon their territory. The term expired on the 25th, and, no answer having been received, on the 27th of January 6000 men of all arms, formed into seven columns, marched against them, with orders to spare the tribes of every chief who would quietly surrender, but to cut down the crops, take the cattle, and destroy every enemy found upon the land of the disaffected. The result of these operations remains to be seen; but little doubt, however, was entertained that they would be so far successful, that the Kaffirs would be glad to submit to any terms that may be dictated. They are short of powder, and anxious to reap their crops, and therefore desirous of peace, whilst the forces now at the disposal of the Commander-in-Chief are of overwhelming strength.

The hardships endured by the troops in this bush warfare are described as unexampled in their severity. On some occasions the men had not changed their clothes for several weeks. The rains had been excessive—sometimes continuing incessantly for three days; there were no tents, and both officers and men had to sleep on the ground—a blanket generally being their only protection. Colonel Burns and party, in charge of fifty empty wagons, who started on the 14th December from the Wh te Kei for Whittlesea to obtain provisions, had experienced most violent thunder-storms and heavy rains for several successive days; and the ground was so swampy, that sometimes as many as twenty-four oxen were yoked to each wagon. On the 21st, 22d, and 23d December, they could only succeed in advancing a mile each day; the Kaffirs watching them in great numbers from the surrounding hills, but not venturing to molest them. They ultimately accomplished their march in nine days, the distance ordinarily occupying but three days.

Fort White and Fort Cox had been successfully supplied with provisions from King William's Town up to the 16th January. This was effected in the course of three days, and without any molestation from the enemy.

The accompanying Illustration, from a Sketch by a Correspondent, shows Fort Grey, the first fort on the road to King William's Town from Buffalo Mouth. This View gives a general good idea of the erections in the colony which our troops have often to defend.

WAGGON OF NATAL.

The most expensive item in the outlay of a Natal farmer is a waggon, such as our Artist, Mr. J. B. West, jun., has here pictured, ascending the Uncommoss Hill, on the Upper Drift of the Uncommoss River, Natal Colony, on the road to Morley Mission station. An African waggon requires to be very strongly made; for which the different woods employed are well adapted. The roads in some parts of Natal are not unfrequently very rough, and would be altogether impassable by any English-built vehicle; but the Dutchman has made its construction his great study. It is drawn by a span of twelve or fourteen oxen, which are attached by yokes fastened on the neck to a long chain or treck-tow, which is made fast to the dissel-boom or pole of the waggon, to which the hind oxen are yoked, and depended upon for guidance. Each ox has its name, to which it attends, being kept in perpetual fear of the whip, the stock of which is ten or twelve feet long, and, in the hands of an expert driver, is an instrument capable of inflicting very severe punishment, often cutting through the skin, and marking the animal for life. The oxen have reins or thongs of undressed skin tied round their horns, and a native is required to lead the front pair. The best drivers are the Hottentots, who walk alongside the team or seat themselves on the front chest, and shout and scream to their charge in a language quite unintelligible and unutterable save by the initiated. They will travel at the rate of between thirty and forty miles per day; and will do this for some months, with proper care, on tolerable roads. All waggons are covered in with a canvas tent, which is either painted or lined, so as to be perfectly dry and comfortable in cold or rainy weather.

FORT GREY, BETWEEN KING WILLIAM'S TOWN AND BUFFALO MOUTH

MARSHAL MARMONT.

"ULTIMUS ROMANORUM!" The very last, indeed, and one most remarkable of a brilliant galaxy—the imperial Marshals of Napoleon, died on the 2d inst. at Venice. The surrender of Paris to the allies in 1814 by Marmont, whether in treachery to Bonaparte or in good faith to France, attached the Marshal, in his subsequent career, irrevocably to the Bourbons; his memorable defence of their cause in 1830 made him an exile for the rest of his life. Yet this commander, despite of faults which he severely atoned for, has high claims to the favourable remembrance and the respect of his country, for during the achievement of her imperial fame, his sword scarcely ever rested in the sheath. M. Thiers has adjudged him to have been one of the best tacticians in the Emperor's armies.

Augustus Frederick Louis Viesse de Marmont, Duke of Ragusa, a Marshal of France, and Knight Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour and of St. Louis, and Knight of the Order of the Holy Ghost, was the scion of an ancient noble Burgundian family, which for centuries had supplied warriors to France. He was born at Châtillon-sur-Seine, in the department of the Côte d'Or, on the 20th July, 1774. Marmont inherited, and from his earliest youth displayed, the martial spirit of his ancestors. In his fifteenth year he entered the French army as sub lieutenant in a regiment of infantry: but convinced that promotion would be more rapid in the artillery, he soon abandoned the former service for the latter. At Toulon he attracted the notice of Bonaparte; and when that youthful hero was invested with the command of the army of the Interior, Marmont hastened to Paris, and was appointed his aide-de-camp.

Throughout the campaigns of Italy, Egypt, and Syria, Marmont was at the side of Napoleon, and was one of the few selected to return with him to France. In the arduous passage of Mount St. Bernard, and in the affair of Fort St. Bard, Marmont greatly distinguished himself. He commanded the artillery at Marengo; and at the close of the campaign became a General of Division. In the wars from 1805 to 1807, Marmont served with equal honours. In the campaigns of 1808 and 1809, so glorious to Napoleon and his satellites, Marmont took part heart and soul: he proved himself one of the sinews of the imperial strength and conquest. He it was who had carried on the siege of Ragusa, and occupied the territory of the old Ragusan Republic. He shared in the great victory of Wagram. For reward of these services he obtained a Marshal's bâton, and the title of Duke of Ragusa. After this he was ordered to replace Massena in his Portuguese command. On his arrival in Spain Marmont effected a junction with the army of Soult, and their combined forces marched to relieve Badajoz, then besieged by Wellington. The English General was not sufficiently strong to oppose them, and retreated towards Salamanca, the Duke of Ragusa following him. For a time they watched each other, neither being willing to strike the first blow; but a blunder of Marmont at length threw the initiative into the hands of Wellington. He was at dinner in his tent, when information was brought him that the French were extending their wing, probably to outflank him. "Marmont's good genius has forsaken him!" said Wellington, and instantly mounted his horse. The French could not withstand the impetuous onset of the enemy; they were driven from their positions, and the disorder of their flight was much increased, in consequence of a wound which deprived them of Marmont's services early in the action, and led to the amputation of his arm. This engagement was the great, and to us the glorious, battle of Salamanca. Though unable from his wound to proceed to Russia, Marmont had command at Lutzen, Bautzen, and at Leipsic, where he was wounded again. He afterwards defended, step by step, the territory of France against the formidable masses of the enemy which swept over it from the Rhine to the capital. His heroic efforts to repel the armed hordes of Austria and Russia have long been the admiration of military men. It is almost a pity that he did not fall during the struggle, while still in the greatness and the purity of his fame; what came of his subsequent life was neither but bitterness. On the 29th March, 1814, in disregard of the express directions of the Emperor, and of the giant advance of Napoleon himself to relieve the city, Marmont felt it necessary to agree to the evacuation of Paris in favour of the allies. For this act Napoleon denounced him as a traitor, and Napoleon's subjects never forgave him. During the hundred days, Marmont remained faithful to the Bourbons. On their return he was named King's-Lieutenant. He was also made a Peer of France, and as such he committed an act of far more certain shame than his surrender of Paris: he voted for the death of Ney. In 1826 he was Ambassador for France in Russia, at the coronation of the Emperor Nicholas.

On the promulgation of the fatal ordinances by Charles X., in 1830, Marmont was called upon to undertake the military suppression of the insurrection in Paris. Averse himself to the policy that the Ministry was then adopting, he nevertheless felt himself bound to obey the King in this extremity, and to sustain the Royal authority. "I am," said he, "a Marshal under orders, and I am bound by my duty to continue the contest as long as the result is doubtful;" and he acted accordingly. When he found all was lost, he withdrew his troops, and shortly afterwards he followed his deposed Sovereign into exile. This event terminated the public career of Marmont; he has since lived and died in retirement away from France. His name was erased from the list of Marshals, and a black veil covered his portrait in the Salle des Marechaux at the Palace of the Tuileries, as in the case of the picture of Marino Faliero, in the Ducal Palace at Venice. Did he altogether deserve this?

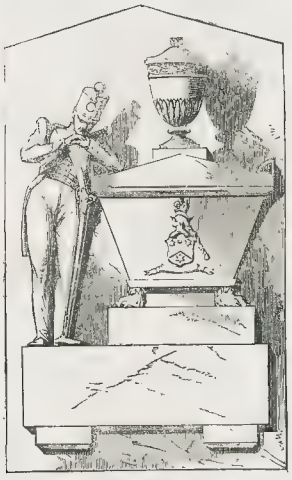
The little more than twenty years that have passed over, and the momentous changes that have befallen the French since the armed struggle of 1830, in which Marshal Marmont took so leading a part, have effected a great change in men's opinions on the subject. What then was looked on as a mere rebel attempt upon the liberty of the people, appears now rather an endeavour to restrain, by a stretch of the law that terrible spirit of anarchy in France, which, after years of frequent outbreak and bloodshed, has yielded only to a far more absolute power than ever entered into the contemplation of the Bourbon Monarch and his advisers. Most possibly, as years roll on, posterity, in its leniency to Charles X., will be inclined to be still more favourable to Marshal Marmont, who undoubtedly was one of the best and bravest soldiers of his time.

REWARDS TO HUMANITY AND BRAVERY.—Two splendid chronometers, intended for presentation to Messrs. Sheard and W. Evans, are now on view at Mr. Alderman Carter's, of Cornhill, with the following inscriptions:—"The inhabitants of Mauritius present this chronometer to Mr. Samuel Bishop Sheard, late second officer of the ship Randolph, wrecked on this island on the night of the 25th June, 1851, to mark their admiration of his gallantry and humanity in repeatedly risking his life, under circumstances of peril and danger, in order to save the Indian immigrant passengers, in which he was eminently successful." "Presented by the Royal Mail Steam-packet Company to Mr. W. Evans, master of the brig Mermaid, of London, in acknowledgment of his humane conduct towards 21 survivors of the Amazon steam-ship.—4th January 1852."

MOOLGUNBHOY KUMEMCHUND, THE BANKER OF AHMEDABAD.

MONUMENT TO LIEUT.-COLONEL DAVIS.

A military monument, executed by Mr. Physick, sculptor, Kingstreet, St. James's, has just been erected in the church at Kingham, Oxfordshire, by a private friend, to the memory of the late Lieut.-Colonel Davis, who commanded the 52d Oxfordshire Light Infantry. It represents a soldier of the 52d in a mourning position, leaning over an urn, which surmounts a sarcophagus; the effect is altogether impressive.



MONUMENTAL TABLET TO LIEUT.-COL. DAVIS, JUST PLACED IN KINGHAM CHURCH, NEAR CHIPPING NORTON.

Colonel Davis was an officer generally known in the service, having served 24 years in the distinguished regiment of which he rose to the command. He was universally beloved by a very extensive acquaintance, and much respected as a talented officer, ever desirous of improving the social and moral condition of the men, and as an accomplished scholar and gentleman in all the transactions of life.

MUGGUNBHOY KUMEMCHUND, THE BOMBAY BANKER.

We have much pleasure in recording a most munificent act of the above wealthy sowcar, or banker, of Ahmedabad, in the presidency of Bombay; and who, in the cause of female education is emulating the princely liberality of Sir Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy, whose friend he is. Muggunbhoy Kumemchund has lately placed in the hands of Government the sum of 20,000 rupees, for the purpose of building and endowing a female school in Ahmedabad; in consideration of which the Right Honourable the Governor in council has conferred on him the title of Rao Bahadur; and on the 29th of September, at a crowded durbar, held in the court of the adaulut, a speech in Guzerat having been read by the Sheristadar, a handsome gold medal, having a likeness of her Majesty and a suitable inscription, was presented by C. M. Harrison, Esq., C.S., Judge of Ahmedabad, who had been the medium of communication with Government throughout the transaction; zealously promoting the liberal design, and suggesting the manner of its acknowledgment. In returning home, escorted by a numerous body of friends, the Rao Bahadur scattered silver to the populace. The first stone of the new school was laid by Mr. Harrison in the evening.

The accompanying Portrait is from a clever painting by W. Carpenter, son of Mr. W. H. Carpenter, of the British Museum.

Electric Telegraph.—On Saturday Mr. Reid tried another series of interesting experiments on the South-Western Railway, similar to those he performed at Dover on the 3d inst., one instrument and battery being placed in the Admiralty, Whitehall, and the other in the Portsmouth-dockyard; distance in round numbers 100 miles. Several messages were sent to and fro from the Admiralty to the dockyard by the miniature battery with perfect success. This battery being removed, the piece of zinc and silver was then introduced into the mouth of the operator, and a message sent from London to Portsmouth, and repeated back directly. There were present in the Admiralty—Colonel Wylde, D.R., and Mr. Wylde, jun. At the Portsmouth-dockyard were—Admiral Sir T. Briggs, his Secretary and others. The experiments were previously witnessed by Captain Hamilton of the Admiralty, Mr. Dyer, &c.

RAILROAD ON THE ICE.

We question whether Dr. Lardner, in his comprehensive work on "Railway Economy," has described a more primitive contrivance than the following, which has just been communicated to a United States journal:—

On the mail route by railway between Baltimore and Philadelphia proper, across the river Susquehanna, in the State of Maryland, passengers are taken across by a large steamboat, having a railway on the top, which conveys the mail, the second-class passengers, and the luggage cars. The passengers leave the cars at the wharf, and take fresh ones on the opposite side. This season has been unusually severe, so much so as to freeze the bay; and as the ice drifted it became packed to the depth of ten or twelve feet, which entirely prevented the boat crossing. A single board pathway was laid for the passengers, and the mail and luggage drawn over in sledges by men. This was found to hinder the mail train so much, that the company fell to work, and laid a railway on wide sleepers, levelling and filling up the inequalities of the mass of ice and snow, and the railway was done as if by magic. At each side of the river an inclined plane was constructed on trassels. As soon as the mail and luggage cars arrive they are run down by the brake, and instantly a sleigh, with a man and a pair of stout horses, on the top, which conveys the mail, the second-class passengers, and the luggage cars. The passengers leave the cars at the wharf, and take fresh ones on the opposite side. The Railroad Company have petitioned the Legislature of Maryland several times to grant permission to construct a bridge across, but have hitherto failed. It is hoped that leave will be granted.

I have crossed this river on an average once a month for the last ten years, three times since it has been frozen over this season, which is about six weeks this 14th day of February, and I observed that all objects on the opposite side were as plain again as when the river was open, and the distance appears not one-fourth as great. Is it the evaporation of the water that creates a veil, or what

RAILROAD ON THE FROZEN SUSQUEHANNA, STATE OF MARYLAND.

DAVID BOSWELL REID, M.D., F.R.S.E

The subject of our memoir, second son of the late Dr. Reid, of Edinburgh (a physician distinguished for his scholarship and great literary attainments, and the last in the direct line of the ancient family of De Bonneville), by Christian Arnot, eldest daughter of the deceased Hugo Arnot, Esq., advocate, of Balcormo, well known as author of the "History of Edinburgh" "Criminal Trials," &c., was born at Edinburgh in the June of 1805. He was educated at the High School there, of which Professor Pillans was then rector, and before entering the University spent a year at a chemical manufactory at Portobello, where his attention was first directed, in 1818, to the science to which he has since devoted himself. During his studies he was elected senior president of the Royal Medical Society, then famous as one of the oldest debating societies in the kingdom. He engaged at that period in dispensary practice, which made him familiar with the condition of the homes and mode of life of the labouring population of Edinburgh; and also for a short time undertook the duties of resident physician in the Fever Hospital at Queensbury House. He subsequently took his degree of M.D. at the University.

In 1825, after spending some time abroad, he opened classes in Edinburgh for instruction in chemistry—at the commencement with no great promise, for during his first session he had but one pupil. The number, however, rose rapidly, so that for the seven years preceding his removal to London they exceeded 300 annually.

Dr. Reid's medical practice amongst the poorer portion of the population, and the continually recurring prevalence, in certain localities, of fever in its most virulent forms, drew his attention to the consideration how far the sufferings of the people were attributable to removable causes of disease; and he became, in the course of his investigation, so impressed with the importance of the sanitary improvement of the dwellings of the poor, as to make it a prominent topic in his lectures. Numbers of his pupils were thus led to the same important field of inquiry, and have many of them become distinguished sanitary reformers at home and abroad.

At the meeting of the British Association at Edinburgh, in 1834, his lecture and class-rooms (constructed, under his direction, with especial regard to sanitary arrangements for the health of his pupils) were thrown open to the inspection of the Association, and were visited by several members of both Houses of Parliament, who took great interest in the acoustic effects of the construction adopted, by which, whether crowded or empty, a moderate voice, without being raised beyond the tone of ordinary conversation, could be heard with perfect distinctness and facility in every part of the room, and Dr. Reid contends that rooms for the communication of sound may be constructed in the same manner as instruments, giving a range of power and facility for the voice, and also for musical purposes, which would far exceed anything that has yet been erected. So complete in these rooms were the appliances for experiments on a large scale, that the place had more the appearance of a manufacturing workshop than of class and lecture-rooms. The roof was supported on fourteen hollow columns, surrounding which were no fewer than 100 furnaces, one central column alone having 22. There were 200 gas-burners—air-flues, drains, and water were accessible at every point—and a steam-engine, the gift of the late James Baird, manager of the Shotts Iron-works, enabled the Doctor's pupils to carry out every process in the manufacture of iron, and to make large castings in every description of metal.

DR. DAVID BOSWELL REID.—FROM A DAGUERREOTYPE BY BEARD.

Scarcely had the members of the Association returned to town than the Houses of Parliament were burnt down; and on the appointment of the committee of 1835, to consider the acoustic and ventilation arrangement of the new Houses of Parliament, Dr. Reid's rooms were at once called to mind. He was sent for, and, with a number of other witnesses, examined upon the subject; and in the following year, as a practical test of the principles he had recommended, he was entrusted with their application to the House then in use for the Commons, and subsequently to the temporary House of Peers. The works for acoustics and ventilation at the old House of Commons were completed in three months, at an expense of less than £6000; and up to the last session, a period of fifteen years, were continuously in use, forming "the first systematic plan of ventilation ever carried out in any public building, either in this or any other country."

In 1840 Dr. Reid was appointed to arrange and superintend the ventilation of the new Houses; and in 1844 the lighting also was put into his hands. The committees of both Houses, in 1846, reported instructions for the continuance of the application of his plans; but later in the same year he was deprived of all power and authority in the matter, and has never since acted in his appointed capacity, except under protest, nor has he been afforded the essential facilities for the completion of his original scheme. Meanwhile, however, he has had the opportunity of proving on a large scale the practicability of his plans in the courts of law at St. George's-hall, Liverpool. In 1847 the House of Commons again entrusted its ventilation to Dr. Reid, and, by a resolution in the present session, the lighting has also been confided to him. But Dr. Reid's labours have not been devoted alone to the subject of ventilation. He early entered into investigations connected with the moral and physical condition of the people, and urged the impossibility of their proper progressive elevation, unless the system of elementary education included the practical application of scientific knowledge to every-day life, in agriculture, arts, manufactures, and the appliances of home essential to health and longevity.

Dr. Reid has also written upon his favourite subjects. He first published, in 1834, at Black's, in Edinburgh, an introduction to the study of chemistry. This was followed by other works on chemistry; and in 1844 he published, at Longman's, his illustrations of ventilation. His report, as one of the Commissioners of Health of Towns, to which he was appointed in 1843, was published, with illustrations, in 1845, and many thousand copies were circulated by the Government. His "Elements of the Theory and Practice of Chemistry," and his "Text-Book for Professional Students," in which he introduced a new system of diagrams, have each gone through three editions, and were published by Maclachlan, of Edinburgh. His "Rudiments of the Chemistry of Daily Life," of which a fourth edition has lately been published by Baillière, has been largely introduced in schools in this country, and also at New York. A lithograph of his class-room, by Standidge, shows the immense extent of the provisions made there for the practical study of chemistry; and in 1847, at the request of the Russian Government, drawings and apparatus were sent to St. Petersburgh, for the establishment of a chemical school, based on the same arrangements.

Tickets to a thousand teachers were issued at the Privy Council Office for admission to a gratuitous course of lectures given by him at Exeter Hall, under the sanction of the Committee of Council on Education, and were also transmitted from the same office to members of both Houses of Parliament, and a society was established, which met at Dr. Reid's house, for the purpose of advocating measures for the improvement of health. Many of the members undertook inquiries in different parts of London, and the metropolis was subdivided into districts for the purpose. In 1843 Government took up the question generally, by the appointment of the Health of Towns Commission, of which Dr. Reid was a member.

When he had thus obtained extensive and facilities for advocating the cause of sanitary improvement, beginning at the very foundation of the necessity for ventilation, he experimented on respiration, with a thousand different individuals. The results led to a new estimate of the amount of air required for health and comfort, and these formed the basis of all the more peculiar arrangements that have attended the introduction of his plans. In his investigations he did not content himself with the examination of the effects of the atmosphere on the human frame in England, Scotland, and Ireland, but also examined many thousand buildings abroad, particularly in Paris, Berlin, St. Petersburgh, Stockholm, and other continental towns. From the Emperor of Russia he twice received public honours, and the late King of France instructed him to ventilate the Tuileries, after inviting him to his table at St. Cloud and receiving his report in reference to that building and the Palais Royal. He recommended his Majesty, however, that the work should not be executed unless the architects were prepared to give those facilities that were requisite for a successful result.

The ventilation of her Majesty's yacht Victoria and Albert presents the most complete arrangements hitherto introduced in any ship, no less than about seventy different compartments being specially ventilated, and even the engine-rooms being subjected to a change of atmosphere. Seven other ships of war have in a similar manner had, under Dr. Reid's direction, provision made for the health and comfort of all hands. His system has been carried out in several prisons. One architect (Mr. J. Brown) has made use of it in 26 public buildings; and it deserves mention, that, in a gaol built by him on the Calton-hill, there was not a single case of influenza amongst the prisoners at the very time the year preceding the last visitation of cholera) that one half the inhabitants of the city were said to be suffering from the epidemic.

As the only effectual safeguard against the lamentable accidents of such frequent occurrence in coal-mines, Dr. Reid urged upon the committee of 1845 that no system could be worked with effect until the managers and inspectors of mines were systematically acquainted in the ascertained facts and practical principles of ventilation. Unless these men, on whom rested so many lives, were well informed, no contrivances, however admirable, could be effective.

But he has not confined his attention to ventilation. In one of the Health of Towns Commission reports is a lithograph of a bath of his contrivance, combining hot air, vapour, and hot water shower bath, and by which he asserts all fevers arising from the effects of bad drainage, &c may at once be arrested at their commencement. To the Doctor also belongs the honour of having, in 1838, been one of the originators of the Scottish Institution for the Education of Ladies, the first college in the United Kingdom that enabled them to obtain a systematic course of instruction, and as part of the science of which was included a knowledge of the principles of the preservation of health and prevention of disease. This college was, also, the first to give diplomas of qualification to those desirous of becoming instructors.

In his native city Dr. Reid has three received public testimonials, the last a silver epergne, designed by Professor Cockerell, which was presented to him on his departure for India in 1846. He was also presented with plate by the officers of the Niger Expedition.

Our Portrait is from a Daguerreotype by Beard.

[Dr. Reid's proposed plan for ventilating the New House of Commons, from the Appendix to the Report presented to Parliament on Tuesday last, is given in the Supplement published with the present Number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.]

COMPLETION OF THE GRIMSBY DOCKS.

These Docks, the foundation-stone of which was laid by his Royal Highness Prince Albert on the 16th of April, 1849, amidst one of the heaviest snow storms recollected, having been so far completed as to ensure them being opened for the reception of vessels about the 1st of May next, the contractors invited a large party of the directors of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company—to whom the Docks belong, and are likely to prove most valuable to them as a "terminus," and thereby secure a large portion of the traffic of Germany and the north of Europe over theirs and the Great Northern Company's lines—to view the Docks, and partake of a luncheon in the dock pit, prior to leaving in the water at the close of next month. On Tuesday last the anticipated visit and luncheon, special trains left London by the Great Northern line, and Manchester by the Stafford and Lincolnshire line, at half past eight in the morning, conveying large parties of the directors and other guests to Grimsby, where they arrived about half-past twelve, having performed the respective distances at a rate of forty miles an hour. The day being beautifully fine, the sun shining most splendidly, the church bells ringing merrily, and the Docks and vessels in the river gaily decorated with flags, a brilliancy was imparted to the scene which contrasted very favourably with the cold and gloom of the day on which the foundation-stone was laid.

Although the works present a very imposing appearance, and cannot fail to strike the beholder with admiration at what has been effected, there at present seems no much to be completed, that to the uninitiated it would appear almost impossible that the Docks could be ready for opening at the time indicated, though we are assured that Mr. Rendel, the engineer, and the contractors, Messrs Hutchings and Co., have no doubt of having everything ready in time for the commencement of the traffic on the 1st of May, though there will still remain much to be done.

The company having amused themselves for some time examining the works, were conducted into a very tastefully decorated marquee erected by Mr. B. Edgington in the Dock pit, where an excellent luncheon was provided under the superintendence of Messrs. Archer and Holt, of the Nell Gwynne tavern, London. The chair was taken by the Right Hon. the Earl of Yarborough, the chairman of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Company. His Lordship was supported by the Earl Powis, Lord Alfred Paget, Commodore of the Royal Yacht Club; Admiral Mercuryan, R.N., of the London and North-western Railway; Mr. Packe, M.P., deputy chairman of the Great Northern Railway; Mr. Pelo, M.P., Mr. Renbuck, M.P., Mr. Parker, M.P., Mr. Gesch, M.P., Mr. Rendell the engineer, and about 200 other gentlemen interested in the undertaking.

Upon the removal of the cloth the chairman proceeded to give the usual loyal and complimentary toasts, which the company received with much cheering, and, as his Royal Highness Prince Albert had taken so deep an interest in the undertaking as to condescend to lay the foundation stone, he would prevail upon her Majesty to visit Grimsby Docks on one of her visits to Scotland, when he was sure the whole town would give her Majesty and family a hearty welcome.

The healths of the directors of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway, the contractors, &c., having been drunk, a portion of the company left at seven o'clock P.M. by a special train for Manchester, and the remainder, at Wednesday morning, at 1 A.M., by the Great Northern line, reaching London at 5 A.M. The delay arising for taking off one of the carriages, it did not arrive in London until twenty minutes to twelve.

We shall Illustrate the appearance of the Docks and events of the day in our Paper of next week.

BANK OF ENGLAND.—At the usual half yearly meeting on Thursday, a dividend of 4 per cent. was declared. The proprietor received the net profit for the half-year ending the 5th of January last was £546,972, being less [illegible] than the corresponding period. There was £300,000, and he had to inform the court that they (the directors) proposed to divide 4 per cent. of dividend, free of Income-tax, on account of the payments of the dividend the rest would be £3,022,070, being £9295 more than in the corresponding half-year.

AN ORIGINAL STAGE SCENE.—A curious circumstance has just interrupted the performance of the French artists at the Theatre Royal, Barbican. A Mdlle. Marie Roger was to make her début in Jeanne Mathieu. A select audience had assembled, and the King and Queen were in the Royal box. The curtain accordingly rose, and Mdlle. Roger made her entry, when suddenly appeared at her side another actress, Mdlle. Berté, dressed for the part assigned in the bills to Mdlle Roger, and took up her action and dialogue. The latter retired her hands in despair, and withdrew. The public, however, were by no means disposed to acquiesce in this substitution, and by its disapprobation compelled the intruder to retire. The manager was now called forward to state what he knew of this strange proceeding, and explained that Mdlle. Berté, indignant at seeing taken from her a part which she conceived she had made her own, had concealed herself in the coulisses to endeavour to carry off the applause which she conceived was hers of right. This act of courage, worthy a better cause, was laughed at. Mdlle. Roger again appeared and played with much success, the public seeming willing to compensate her for her first misadventure.

Captain Austin, the new Admiralty superintendent of mail-packets at Southampton, arrived there on Monday, to commence the performance of his official duties. The gallant officer will reside in Southampton, in accordance with a recent Admiralty order.

THE ASSISTANT-SURGEON OF THE "ALBION."—Dr. Mason, the assistant-surgeon of the Albion, has been presented with a handsome gold watch and chain, after he had passed the prescribed examination, by the whole of his shipmates as a token of their regard and esteem.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 20, 1852.

At length there is a reasonable prospect of an end to the Kaffir war. Probably it has been already brought to a triumphant conclusion; for the last advices from the Cape state that the principal Kaffir chiefs, beaten or out-manœuvred, and threatened with certain famine in case of prolonged resistance, have sued for peace. The next arrival, it is to be confidently expected, will bring the welcome intelligence that Sir Harry Smith has finally subjugated them. The country will have much reason to rejoice at such a consummation, for this unhappy war was not simply discreditable to our arms, but ruinous to our resources. It was waged against an enemy whom it was no glory to subdue, but by whom it was most vexatious and disgraceful to be baffled; and was carried on at a cost wholly incommensurate with the advantages that were likely to be gained by it. But while the country will rejoice for its own sake that the surplus revenues hitherto engulphed in the hungry maw of Kaffraria will be set free, to be devoted to better purposes at home, it will also rejoice, for the sake of the gallant Sir Harry Smith, that it has been by his exertions that the war has been concluded. It may be safely said that there was not a gentleman in England who did not feel regret and sympathy that Sir Harry Smith should have been made the scapegoat of Earl Grey, and that Earl Grey should have subjected a gallant soldier to the indignity of receiving such a letter of recall as that which his Lordship did not think it unbecoming to address to him. That letter was the severest condemnation ever inflicted upon the late colonial administration; for, although the condemnation was meant for Sir Harry Smith, it reacted upon its own author. There will be no small satisfaction to Sir Harry Smith to have concluded the war before his letter of recall reached him, and to hand over the civil and military government of the colony to his successor with no other task before him than that of turning victory to the best account. In this moment it should not be forgotten in England, where we may soon expect to see the late Governor of the Cape, that he was continually thwarted by the Colonial Office; that he asked for reinforcements which were refused; and that when, ultimately, in consequence of his reiterated demands, those reinforcements were grudgingly sent to him, he needed nothing more to terminate the war with honour and success. The treatment he received from Lord Grey will serve as an additional stimulus to his countrymen to give him a cordial reception on his return. Thus the past indignity will increase the future triumph. On all merely personal questions the common sense and common feeling of the public are sure to do justice, and Sir Harry Smith is already avenged.

But the task reserved for his successor, though simplified, will be arduous. To place the future relations of the disaffected Dutch, the discontented English, and the treacherous though subdued Kaffirs, upon a satisfactory footing, and to make the colony free, prosperous, and happy, is an undertaking of no common responsibility. General Cathcart has his work before him, and, if he succeed, will deserve, even more than Sir Harry Smith, the gratitude of his country. We do not know what kind of a Colonial Minister we at present have the happiness—or, it may be, the unhappiness—to possess; but there is one comfort in the reflection that he cannot be worse, and is, in all probability, better than the last. The colony possesses, or will immediately possess, the inestimable right of local self-government; and, if the necessary measures of improvement to be taken on the spot be not delayed or thwarted by any proceedings in Downing-street, by the present or any future holder of the colonial seals, we may reasonably anticipate that it will become in due time a source of strength, as well as of pride, to the British empire.

The present Parliament has abundance of work before it, whether it employ its energies in fighting the battle of Free Trade, or whether it accept the invitation of Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli to aid in the framing of the various measures which the interest of the country requires. It will have to pass a Militia Bill of some kind; not that of which Lord John Russell's Administration expired, but one better adapted to the end in view: and it may be presumed, however keen and protracted the debates upon it may be, that the House of Commons and the Administration will be able to come to an understanding about it. The same may be said of the necessary renewal of the Income-tax, unless Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli should decide upon making an appeal to the country upon the whole question of the Budget, in which case the Income-tax question will merge into the larger one of Free Trade, and be left for the next Parliament to consider. The Ministerial measure for the well-merited disfranchisement of the notorious borough of St. Alban's, and the bestowal of its two members and those of Sudbury upon some other places, such as Birkenhead or the Gorbals of Glasgow, is not of immediate importance. If the measure can be passed during this session, it will be well; but if it do not pass, it will not signify; and St. Alban's may again return to Parliament the representatives of its venality, without any great additional injury to its character, and with no detriment to the public service.

But the case is different with the last of the great measures which Lord Derby has wisely adopted from the Government of his predecessor. The reform of the Court of Chancery ought not to be postponed. That court is admitted by the universal consent of all parties—judges and advocates, as well as the unhappy suitors—to be the greatest abuse in the empire. The public of all classes read with unmixed satisfaction the clear and able speech of Lord St. Leonard's, in which his Lordship announced the approaching doom of that venerable nuisance; and in proportion to the satisfaction experienced at such a statement from so admirable a lawyer, will be the regret of the public if the wars of faction in the Lower House should lead to the postponement of that measure to a future Parliament. There is, however, some reason to fear that such will be the result. The Ministry admit, and even insist upon the importance of the measure; but in giving to a meditated bread-tax the paramount claim to the decision of the country, they throw all other questions into insignificance, and prepare the way for their temporary abandonment. But the success of this particular measure rests more with the Ministry than with the House of Commons. If Lord Derby is really as anxious that it should pass as the explanation of Lord St. Leonard's would lead the public to believe, it remains with his Lordship and Mr. Disraeli to urge it forward. All the facts are known, the mind of the public is made up, there is little or no difference of opinion even upon the minor details of the proposed reform, and the measure might without difficulty become law before the approaching dissolution. We fear that party exigencies will not permit the consummation; but while we fear, it is not without a hope that means may be taken to save this one brand from the burning.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT OSBORNE.

During the past week her Majesty, the Prince Consort, and the Royal family have taken their customary exercise daily.

Divine service was performed on Sunday by the Rev. Mr. Protheroe before her Majesty, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, and the Princess Royal. The ladies and gentlemen in attendance and the Royal household were also present.

On Monday evening, the Marquis and Marchioness of Salisbury entertained a distinguished circle at dinner, at the family mansion in Arlington-street.

Lord John Russell had a Parliamentary dinner party, on Tuesday, at his residence in Chesham-place.

The Countess of Derby gave the first of a series of receptions on Wednesday night, at the official residence of the First Lord of the Treasury, in Downing-street. The réunion was honoured with the presence of about 700 leading members of the political and fashionable world.

The Earl of Lonsdale (Lord President of the Council) gave a dinner to the Cabinet Ministers on Wednesday evening, at his residence on Carlton House Terrace.

THE FIRST LEVEE OF THE NEW LORD-LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND.—There was a vast attendance of the nobility, gentry, and the clergy of the Established Church at the first levee of the Lord-Lieutenant, held by his Excellency on Tuesday, in Dublin Castle. There were nearly two thousand persons present, including upwards of thirty Peers. It is stated that this was the most numerous levee for several years, with the exception of that held by the Queen during her Majesty's visit.

On Monday last the Presence Chamber of Dublin Castle was so densely crowded by a deputation from the Provost, Fellows, Scholars, &c. of Trinity College, who were in the act of presenting an address to the Earl of Clarendon, as Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, that a portion of the flooring gave way; and had the ceiling below not been supported by the projection of some pillars, the whole floor would inevitably have fallen in, and a terrible catastrophe have resulted.

The largest temperance hall in the kingdom is about to be erected at Leicester, in the principal thoroughfare, leading from the railway station to the centre of the town.

The last accounts from Hong-Kong state that seventeen American whalers had lately arrived in that harbour. The fishing during the past season has been unprofitable.

The Inverness Courier relates an instance of presence of mind in a farmer's daughter, who, being attacked by a ferocious bull in a level field at North Ord, with no place of refuge to resort to, and three-quarters of a mile from home, placed herself under the protection of a grey-haired bull, which [illegible] gored a dog with her across the field, keeping her assailant at bay.

On Monday last the largest quantity of machinery sent out of Blackburn at one time was forwarded by the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway to Liverpool, for shipment to Sweden. The train consisted of about thirty waggons, heavily laden, and took three engines to propel it beyond the Sough Tunnel, from whence two were required. The machinery comprised looms, carding and sizing machines, and other necessaries for a weaving [illegible]

From a return just printed by order of the House of Lords, it appears that down to the end of last year £.5,665 8s. 4d. was to be applied out of the Rate-in-Aid Fund for the emigration of paupers from Ireland.

A correspondent from Alexandria by the Overland Mail states that the American Consul there has taken down his flag in consequence of a disagreement with the Pasha's Government about certain claims made by an American citizen for the removal of a balcheonse to enable the Egyptian Government to construct a street some years since.

HARROW SCHOOL.—The following annual prizes have been recently adjudged:—The Gregory Medal (Latin prose), Mr. W. H. Stone; the Latin hexameters, Mr. W. H. Stone; the Peel medal (Latin essay), Mr. W. H. Stone; the Greek Iambics, Mr. C. H. Monro. In the latter subject Mr. R. D. Wilson's exercises was highly commended. The arithmetic and algebra prizes, given by the Rev. R. Middlemist, mathematical master, have been also adjudged as follows:—The former to Mr. W. H. Stone and Mr. R. D. M Neale; the latter to Mr. W. H. Stone and Mr. Leacock. The Right Hon. the Earl Spencer has recently founded a scholarship at Harrow of the value of £30 per annum, to be held for three years.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CAMBRIDGE.—The Vice-Chancellor has given notice, that Congregations will be held at eleven o'clock on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, April 28, 29, and 30, at which special Graces will be offered to the Senate.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—The Bishop of Cape Town has been appointed the Rev. William A. Newman, M.A., to be Dean of Cape Town and Commissary for conducting the affairs of the diocese, with the aid of the Archdeacons of Graham's Town and George Town, and the Rural Deans of Natal and St. Helena.

THE LEAMINGTON COLLEGE.—A scheme has just been proposed for converting this proprietary establishment into a public school upon a similar principle to those of Harrow, Eton, Rugby, and Winchester, being, we believe, the first scheme which has been made to the foundation schools for the country between two and three centuries. One gentleman has already made a testamentary disposition of £500 in support of the new foundation; and the Lord Bishop of Worcester, who visited the college last week, and found the new house[illegible] much pleased with the arrangements, especially those of the chapel and the hall, has signified his willingness to accept the visitorship of the new institution.

THE BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND HORFIELD MANOR.—The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, Dr. Monk, has, by a deed of gift, conveyed the whole of his interest in Horfield manor to five trustees, for the benefit of such Clergymen of the diocese of Gloucester and Bristol. The trustees are Sir William Page Wood, M.P., the late Sol-citor General; Mr. Philip William Skinner Miles, M.P. for Bristol; the Venerable Thomas Thorp, Archdeacon of Bristol; the Rev. T. Murray Browne, Rural Dean of Gloucester; and Mr. C. J. Monk, the Bishop's son. The copyholds are now all enfranchised, with a very small exception, and the manorial rights of the Bishop have been commuted for land. The property consists partly of tithe rent charge, partly of land. The former is to be divided into two equal parts, for the endowment of the living of Horfield and of a new church, which may be expected to be erected in the newly enfranchised parts of the old parish. The rents of all the land and houses (formerly as well as newly acquired) will be divided equally between two objects of the Bishop's bounty—first, to assist in building parsonages on poor benefices, in public patronage, in the diocese of Gloucester and Bristol; and, secondly, to assist in paying parochial small livings in the diocese of Gloucester and Bristol, the incumbents of which are prevented by sickness, age, or infirmity from discharging their own duties. The donation takes effect from the present time, and its term is for the lives of the Princess Royal, and the Princesses Alice and Helena, and the longest liver of them. The present income of the whole exceeds, we believe, £1000.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.—The following appointments and preferments have been made:—Honorary Canonry: The Rev. J. W. Whittaker in Manchester Cathedral. Minor Canonry: The Rev. G. Hall, in Ely Cathedral. Rectories: the Rev. G. Lockyer to Barton-Westcott, Oxfordshire; the Rev. J. S. C. Vyley to Ecking, Norfolk; the Rev. J. CHURCH EXTENSION.—On Sunday morning the Hon. and Rev. H. M. Villiers, rector of St. George's, Bloomsbury, preached a sermon at the parish church of St. Pancras, in aid of the St. Pancras Church Extension Fund. And in an impressive discourse enforced the duty and necessity of which exertion in this parish, the population of which has increased from 31,795, in the year 1801, to 170,000. The fund had already granted the sum of £9954 towards the building of churches, providing sites for churches, and for enlarging old fabrics. It had proposed to grant £2000, and made an annual grant of £250 for ministers' stipends; the results of which were one church enlarged, two consecrated, four temporary churches, one free church, nine clergymen, five scripture readers, church accommodation for 9000 persons, 1000 communicants, twelve schools with 2000 children, five district visiting societies, and other institutions essential to the well working of a Christian church. The districts supplied with clergymen by means of the fund contained a population of 49,021 souls. After the sermon the sum of £.32 was collected in aid of the fund.

OXFORD PROFESSORSHIP OF POLITICAL ECONOMY.—Mr. Senior's term of office expires on the 23d inst., but the election of his successor will not take place until next term. Mr. Neate, Mr. G. K. Richards, and Mr. Rowe continue candidates for the chair; but whether the contest will proceed to a poll, is at present uncertain.

INCORPORATED SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE ENLARGEMENT, BUILDING, AND REPAIRING OF CHURCHES AND CHAPELS.—The general committee of this society met on Monday last; his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury in the chair. There were also present—his Grace the Archbishop of York; the Bishops of Bangor, Worcester, and Lichfield; the Earl of Powis; the Rev. Sir Charles Farnaby, Bart.; the Venerable Archdeacon Jones; the Revs. Dr. Hook and Wordsworth, &c. Aid was granted towards building new churches at Batterne, in the parish of South Stoneham, near Southampton; Pottery Field, in the parish of Hunslet, near Leeds; Llanwonllwyfo, in the is and of Anglesey; Kingsbridge, in the parish of Stoke upon-Trent, near Newcastle-under-Lyme; Hatcham, in the parish of St. Paul, Deptford; and Little Tew, near Bustone, Oxfordshire; also, towards rebuilding, with enlargement, at Pensley, Staffordshire; and enlarging, near Aberystwith; and changing, or otherwise improving the accommodation in the churches at Ford, near Coddstream; Belton, near Loughborough; and Wilfrith Newburgh, near Dorchester.

The inhabitants of Stanley have presented the Rev. John Smith Hill with a splendid silver tea and coffee service (valued at nearly £60), on his retiring from that curacy, which he has so faithfully served.

DIOCESE OF CHICHESTER.—The rural deans of this diocese assembled last week at the episcopal palace, by invitation from the Bishop, to present reports of the state of the respective deaconries, and to take counsel with the Bishop on various matters of interest connected with the diocese. Among the topics proposed for discussion were the inspection of schools, and the best mode of providing for an increase of the Church's ministrations in populous places. A warm protest was entered into, numerously supported, against recognising Government inspection in Church schools, and an expression was put forth of a decided preference in behalf of the restricted diocesan, should it be found feasible, over the plan of introducing Scripture readers. Towards the close of the proceedings, the Bishop expressed a strong opinion upon the desirableness and necessity of restoring the synodical action of the Church, with more especial reference to Convocation.

The Pitt scholarship was adjudged, on Monday last, to Mr. F. W. Hawkins, of Trinity College, Cambridge

MUNIFICENCE OF MISS BURDETT COUTTS.—This most amiable lady, who but a short time ago built and endowed a magnificent church, with adjoining schools, in one of the most destitute portions of the metropolis, has presented to a splendid painting, descriptive of Christ blessing the little children, 18 feet by 12½ feet, so formed as to fill, with its frame, the entire head of an arch in the chief room of the school-houses. It so happened that the artist entrusted with the production of the painting (Mr. W. Carpenter) was on the point of emigrating, with his family, to Sydney, when he received the order, and, with the consent of Miss Coutts, undertook the task imposed on him with the intention of quitting it at the antipodes. On his arrival at Sydney he transferred to canvas the ideas conceived during his long voyage. The picture was finished, rolled, and despatched to England, where it arrived in safety, and is now prevailed with much graciously to accept it, and to place it in the Great Hall.

On Wednesday the parishioners of St. Benet and St. Peter, Paul's Wharf, in the city of London, presented the Rev. W. J. Hall, M.A., with an elegant testimonial, in gold plate, and a handsome piece of plate, in token of their high esteem and regard for him as their rector during more than 25 years, which living he has now resigned, on being appointed vicar of Tottenham, Middlesex.

FATAL ACCIDENT TO AN UNDERGRADUATE AT CAMBRIDGE.—On Monday afternoon, as Mr. J. F. Anstey, of Trinity College, was leaping his horse over some fences in the field of Mr Sparrow, at Chesterton, he was thrown to the ground, and one of his feet remaining fixed in the stirrup, the animal kicked the head or four times round the field at a fearful pace, the skull, at every stride of the horse, coming in contact with the ground. When taken up he was insensible, and was conveyed to Mr. Sparrow's house; but he survived but a short period, having sustained severe injuries of the skull. The unfortunate gentleman, who was only about twenty years of age, was the son of Gilbert Anstey, Esq., of Houghton Hall, Hants

ACCIDENT ON THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.—On Saturday evening, about eight o'clock, the Manchester and Liverpool train to Manchester ran into an engine from the Longsdon depôt of the London and North-western Company, just as it had got upon the down line to Manchester. The driver was so injured, that shortly afterwards or sixteen persons were much shaken and bruised, but no person was killed or seriously injured.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.—On Saturday night, when the down mail-train, which left the Waterloo terminus at half-past eight o'clock P.M., had arrived within about a mile and a half of Bishopstoke, the tire of the rear leading wheel of the engine flew off, which caused the tender to leave the line, and to run down an embankment about [illegible] The engine driver was killed on the spot, and the fireman died [illegible] The stoker was killed on the spot, and the fireman died [illegible] The stoker was killed on the spot, and the fireman died [illegible] The stoker

EXHIBITION OF THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

(CONCLUDING NOTICE.)

On taking a parting glance at this collection, we find one or two works of considerable merit, entitling them to a passing notice. But, first, of S[illegible]'s fine picture of "Music," which we have already mentioned with commendation, and which we this week Engrave. The boldness of the composition, and the expressive character of the face have been well preserved by our Artist; and the spectator will easily conceive how advantageously the broad masses of colouring of the sky above, and drapery at the base, serve to throw out the figure, the flesh tints of which are faithfully rendered.

Our other Engraving represents Linnell's "Boar Hunt in England—Olden Time," a picture of very decided merit, which attracts a large share of attention. It is a piece of rather large dimensions, measuring 6 feet by 10. The scene represented is a wild hilly woodland; time, evening: the rays of the setting sun gild the whole of the foreground and the extreme distance, the middle distance being of a cooler tone. The colouring of the first strikes us as a little too yellow, and to partake more of local hues than those resulting from atmospheric influences.

Close to the above is a single figure (No. 44), "The Syndic," by R. C. Woodville. The character of the head is very good, and the colouring of the dress, which is of black, with fur collar, is sober and effective, indicating a study of Titian.

Copley Fielding has four small landscapes, in different styles, but all done in his best manner. 83. "Arundel Castle and Town, Sussex," is set off with a rich warm tone; 176. "View of Byland Abbey, looking over Coxwold to the Vale of York," introduces a fine cool distance; 285. "Windsor Forest," takes us to one of the most umbrageous spots in the great forest, whence the Castle is seen in the distance lit up by the rays of the sun; 292. "View of Arundel Castle from the Park," is a charming little bit of landscape portraiture. G. Stanfield has (256) a view of "Ripon, in Yorkshire;" and (476) a view "on the North Esk at Rosslyn"—the latter a well-selected scene, combining rocks and distant hills, and water gushing and bubbling along in the midst, every feature of which is characterised.

W. Oliver's "Château des Beaucons, Valley of Argely, Pyrenees," is carefully and delicately painted, with a pretty distance of plain and stream nicely defined.

Armytage's picture of "Christ Crowned with Thorns" (363) must not be passed over without mention, although we regret to say we cannot speak favourably of it. The head of the Christ is not without dignity and expression, but those of the soldiers are singularly deficient in the latter respect—a deficiency the more remarkable, considering the opportunities which the solemn incident affords. The colouring is extremely unfortunate and ineffective; consisting of blues, violet, and a sort of dirty orange. From such materials what could possibly be expected?

It must not be denied, that, satisfactory as it is in many respects, the present collection contains fully the usual proportion of daubs. These, however, it is never our purpose to seek out. We would rather pass them by with a quiet shrug, and a prayer that the artist may live to do something better in another line. But when, through favour, or the culpable carelessness of the officials, the offending canvas is put forward in a prominent position, where it is impossible to avoid seeing it, we feel bound to cry out. And so it happens, that, on entering the room, we find staring upon us from the place of honour over the north mantelpiece, an enormous presentation of "Peace," represented by a very pink fleshed female, with three chubby urchins, all pink to their very heels, a huge nosegay of flowers, a lion couchant on one side, and on the other a discarded helmet, in whose bright polished surface the artist (Mr. S. H. Gambardella) has ingeniously introduced his own portrait as standing before his easel. This flagrant production is only fit for the decoration of an oil-shop on a Royal birthday.

"MUSIC."—PAINTED BY J. SANT.

Mr. E. F. Owen also has two very extraordinary specimens of colouring (Nos. 100 and 187), over the doors of the North and Middle Rooms respectively. In the first he appears to wish to attempt an imitation of the ostensible peculiarities in some of Turner's pictures, but without his knowledge of cause and effect in the treatment of prismatic colours. The following lines explain the purport of this strange compound of red, white, green, orange, &c.:—

And while the robes imbibe the solar ray,
O'er the green mead the sporting virgins play,
Their shining veils unbound: along the skies
Toss'd, and retoss'd, the ball incessant flies:
They sport, they feast: Nausicaa lifts her voice,
And, warbling sweet, makes earth and heaven rejoice.

Odyssey, Book VI.

The other picture, "The Entombment," is still more extravagant in colouring, red and yellow predominating, and apparently thrown on with a trowel, without any regard to outline, the drawing of the dead Christ being remarkably "out."

Two morceaux in the pre-Raphaelite school (No. 52), "St. Catharine," by W. Denby, and No. 447, "Hotspur and the Courtier," by E. Ransford, will charm those who seek the regeneration of art in that direction. "St. Catharine" is rather sickly in expression and hue, and is surrounded by sickly yellows, red, and pale blues; but the scene from Shakspeare's play is gaudily painted, and the figures have all the truthful and lifelike appearance of a troop of marionettes.

A deputation of London and Bristol merchants engaged in the palm-oil trade on the coast of Africa, accompanied by William Miles, Esq., M.P.; P. J. Miles, Esq., M.P.; and P. H. F. Berkeley, Esq., M.P., had an interview on Saturday morning with Earl Malmesbury, at his private residence, in Whitehall-place, with the object of procuring some relaxation of the present blockade on behalf of British commerce, which is thereby interrupted. His Lordship, who appeared to be impressed by the representations of the deputation with respect to the progress made by legitimate trade in supplanting the slave trade within the line of coast blockaded, while professing the adherence of Government to the policy which would suppress the latter, gratified the memorialists by assuring them that instructions should be given to facilitate their trading operations, as far as was consistent with the measures taken in pursuance of that policy.

"A BOAR-HUNT IN ENGLAND—OLDEN TIME."—PAINTED BY J. LINNELL.

THE LORD-LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND.

Archibald William Montgomerie, fifteenth Earl of Eglinton and Winton, only son of Archibald Lord Montgomerie, by his cousin, Lady Mary Montgomerie, daughter and heir of Archibald, the eleventh Earl, was born at Palermo in 1812. In 1819 he succeeded to the Peerage. He has at various times been appointed Lord-Lieutenant and Sheriff Principal of Ayrshire, Colonel of the Ayrshire Militia, Lord Rector of Marischal College, Aberdeen, and Dean of the Faculty of the University of Glasgow. He is well known on the turf as an earnest supporter of field sports; and in 1840 became famous by the Eglinton Tournament, a pageant of the middle ages, shown in these trading and machinery days with all the old splendour, but without the possibility of the old spirit. However, the passage of arms at Eglinton grew far beyond the original intention of its projector. He looked to a few, but thousands came, and the expense was enormous. As a landlord the Earl has endeavoured to promote agricultural improvements amongst his tenantry, and general education amongst the people in the neighbourhood of his estate.

In 1841 his Lordship married Theresa, daughter of Charles Newcomen, Esq., widow of Richard Howe Cockerell, Esq., Commander, R.N.

On Tuesday, the 9th inst., he landed at Dublin, and met with a most enthusiastic reception.

Our Portrait is from a Daguerréotype by Kilburn.

THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF EGLINTON.—LORD-LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND.
FROM A DAGUERREOTYPE BY KILBURN.

OPENING OF THE NEW PALAIS DE JUSTICE AT NANTES.

The opening and benediction of a superb new building, the Palais de Justice, or Court-house, at Nantes, took place with great pomp on Tuesday the 2d instant. The edifice has been building between five and six years; it is of magnificent plan, and contains several courts, halls of reception, and depositories for the archives of the department. The design, in handsome Italian style, consists of a basement and two stories, and attics of windows' length on the sides.

The ceremony had been commanded by M. Janvier de la Motte, the President of the Civil Tribunal; and assembled all the religious, civil, and military authorities, the members of the General Council of the department of the Lower Loire, the Municipal Council of Nantes, the journalists, and some of the principal people of the city. The ladies mustered in great force, and occupied the reserved seats. The magistrates of the courts and of the parquet, the members of the Tribunal of Commerce, the justices of the peace, the members of the bar, and the attornies were some upon this bench, and the rest in the Pretoire, or Hall of Judgment.

A magnificent dais had been erected for the Lord Bishop of the diocese of Nantes in the Salle des Pas Perdus, or ante-chamber. The venerable Prelate came in procession about one o'clock, accompanied by a numerous clergy, the military band playing.

On his Lordship taking his place on the throne, the choir chanted the 126th Psalm: "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it," &c.

Serious indisposition having prevented the Bishop speaking, M. Dandé supplied his place, and addressed to the assembly an animated discourse.

The benediction ceremony then took place, and being finished, the assembly passed into the Assize-hall, in which M. Janvier de la Motte opened the session with an excellent speech, which he concluded as follows:—

The noble splendour, which adds to the dignity of this new palace, increases also its strength; but what to-day, above all else, flatters and honours it, is to see in this vast assemblage of the most eminent representatives of religion, of the army, of the Administration, and of commerce, the proof of the sentiments which the magistracy has been able to inspire in them; the manifestation of which, although at first view appearing fruitless, we need not doubt, gentlemen, will become efficacious; for it is by granting to each other everywhere and incessantly a sympathy and a mutual deference, that functionaries of every order will gain influence, will arouse, and will fortify the principle of respect to authority, too long attacked in France, and unhappily enfeebled—a guardian principle to which the man newly elected by eight millions of suffrages, the Prince twice commended by the nation, intends to restore all its powers, for the purpose of preserving the future from those imminent and immense dangers from which his firm will and his courageous hand have been enabled, at present, to save society. I hasten to conclude, gentlemen; but before I do finish, let me be permitted, in the name of the magistracy and the bar, in the name of all the united members of the great judicial family admitted to share this splendid dwelling, to express loudly the profound gratitude which we feel towards the general counsel which has not hesitated to make an enormous sacrifice to raise up again in this country the importance of our institutions; and to tell the first administrator of this department how cordially we feel his persevering efforts for the realisation of a sentiment as elevated as useful; and finally to proclaim that Messrs. Schœlit and Chenantais have good right to our thanks and to the unanimous felicitations of their fellow-citizens. Chosen to build a monument of art which should be capable already during past ages richly endowed by two eminent architects, ought to pride herself on being able to reckon two more."

M. Duportal, the Procureur of the Republic (or Attorney-General of the department of the Lower Loire), afterwards pronounced an oration characterised by lofty sentiment. Having drawn a fearful picture of the "reckless revolutions" of France, he added:—

Disturbed as to the incessate research after the politica philosopher's stone, France prefers the tranquil enjoyment of the real treasures which are in her hand, order and peace, to those imaginary riches which the deceptive mirage of Utopia had promised her. She has confided her destiny in full assurance to the wisdom and to the energy of that Prince whose devotedness is equalled only by the confidence of which he lately has received a striking testimony in the unanimous approbation of the country. Let us unite our aid, gentlemen, to all these generous efforts for the moral regeneration of France. Let us teach respect for the laws by the wise application which we shall be enabled to make of them. Let us restore to our fellow citizens, by our zeal, our devotedness, and our exertions, that which, by their assemblage in this place this day, they have testified towards us on the account of good-will and sympathy. Such is the true signification of this solemnity, such will be the effect of it; and to assure this result you only need to continue to be what you have been. Our efforts, magistrates and members of the bar, will therefore be united in the interest of that France which we all love, to those of that administration which you are so well able, M. le Préfect, to render so paternal and so wise, whose devotedness to all interests, all wants, and all sufferings is a spectacle we witness every day. Let us no less unite our efforts to those of that clergy who have this day given us so striking a testimony of their sympathy; of that clergy who have been at all times one of the most brilliant glories of the country; who never fail in any mission of patriotism, of devotedness, and of charity, to whom France has owed Bossuet, Fénélon, and St. Vincent de Paul—these noble and glorious representatives of eloquence, of learning, of simple and humble piety, of the most sublime and the truest Christian charity. Let us unite our efforts to those of the clergy, in short, in that spirit which the holy Archbishop of Paris recently illustrated by falling in a sacrilegious strife, the expiatory and voluntary victim of our intestine discords.

The session terminated at a quarter past two, having occupied about an hour in the ceremonies of the exorcising and blessing, and in the speeches,

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The County Courts Further Extension Bill was read a third time and passed.

NATIONAL SYSTEM OF EDUCATION IN IRELAND.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE inquired of the Earl of Derby if it was his intention to propose any alteration in the application of the funds granted for educational purposes in Ireland.

The Earl of DERBY, having had a great share in originating the system of combined education in Ireland, naturally took great interest in its progress, which he believed to have been attended with very beneficial results. He had observed with regret that the clergy of the Established Church for the most part stood aloof from that scheme of national education, for the absence of their co-operation was a great misfortune; and it became a question whether, without departing from the original plan, such modifications might not be made in the scheme as might overcome the objections entertained by the clergy. Two years ago he had expressed his conviction that a Parliamentary committee to inquire into the whole subject would be most expedient, and he still believed that if such a committee were fairly appointed, it would, if its inquiry was kept within proper bounds, go very far towards removing the difficulties which existed.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE expressed his concurrence in what had fallen from Lord Derby, and seized the opportunity to pass a warm eulogy on the late Roman Catholic Archbishop Murray.

Lord ROSSEN trusted the present Government would not continue the system pursued by the late and other Governments. The people of England believed that Ministers would uphold the Protestant Church and the institutions of the country, and he sincerely hoped that those expectations would not be disappointed.

Lord MONTEAGLE hoped, if such a committee were appointed, care would be taken to keep its inquiries within fair bounds. He wished also to move for a copy of Mr. Stanley's letter to the Duke of Leinster, laying down the principles upon which the present system was established.

After some further discussion, an order was made for the production of the letter, and the subject dropped.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Lord C. HAMILTON took the oaths and his seat for Tyrone.

SIR J. BROOKE.

Mr. HUME, who had the following notice on the paper, "Copy of any grant or grants under which her Majesty's present Commissioner and Consul-General to the Sultan and independent chiefs of Borneo holds the Sarawak, in the island of Borneo; showing whether the tenure of the same be that of an independent Sovereign, or of a vassal paying tribute to the Sultan of Borneo; and also, under what authority the British flag is hoisted at Sarawak," said he understood no such documents were to be found in the papers of the Foreign-office, and therefore, to save time, he would not move for the return.

Mr DRUMMOND rose to order. The hon. member had no right to place such a motion on the paper, and then withdraw it. The motion could not be withdrawn without the permission of the House, and when that permission was asked, he (Mr. Drummond) would oppose its being granted. (Hear, hear.)

The SPEAKER said the rule of the House was this:—If a motion was placed on the paper, it was quite competent for the member to withdraw it; but if it was once moved, it could not be withdrawn without the consent of the House. In the present case the hon. member had not moved for the return.

Mr. HUME said he withdrew the motion merely to save the time of the House, as he understood the papers were not in existence.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said it might save further controversy if he stated at once that there were no grants of the kind in the archives of the Foreign Office.

VENTILATION OF THE HOUSE.

Lord R GROSVENOR rose, pursuant to notice, "to ask the First Commissioner of Works (Lord John Manners) whether he was able to hold out any hopes of relief to the sufferings of the members from the present state of the ventilation of the House?" The noble Lord pointed out the danger to the health of hon. gentlemen arising from the excessive heat experienced on the floor of the House, while to the galleries they were exposed to continuous drafts of cold air. If something were not done speedily, he anticipated fatal consequences.

Mr W. PATTEN made a similar complaint in regard to the committee-rooms.

Lord J. MANNERS expressed the desire of his department to do all that was possible to remedy the evil. Dr. Reid's report, which had just been presented, would be considered, and Mr. Goldsworthy Gurney had been asked to give his opinion on the subject.

METROPOLITAN INTERMENTS.

In reply to Mr. T. Duncombe, Mr. WALPOLE intimated that it would depend on the continuance of the session and the state of public business whether any measure would be substituted for that of last year which had failed in a object of carrying out extramural interments. Nothing could be done in the matter of the metropolitan water supply until they had the report of the select committee on the subject.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

In answer to Mr T. Duncombe Lord JOHN MANNERS announced that it was not the intention of Government to interpose for the purpose of preventing the demolition of the Crystal Palace.

FRAUDS AT THE DOCKYARDS—COALS.

Mr GEORGE THOMPSON called attention to certain alleged frauds in the supply of coals to the dockyards and public offices, and moved the appointment of a select committee on the subject. The mode in which fraud was said to have been committed was by the contractor being allowed to charge for larger quantities than were really delivered.

Mr. STAFFORD RICE stated the motion, on the ground that no specific case of fraud had been stated, added, that the arrangements now in operation would make it impossible to carry on practices such as those complained of.

The motion was ultimately withdrawn.

PERFORATION OF POSTAGE STAMPS.

Mr. MUNTZ complained of the unfairness with which Mr. Archer, the inventor of the machine for perforating the sheets of postage labels, so as to render them easily separable, had been treated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and moved for a committee of inquiry; upon which

Mr GEORGE THOMPSON moved an amendment for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the present mode of engraving, printing, and gumming the postage-label stamps, and likewise whether and how the perforating machine invented by the patentee could be applied to the same with advantage to the public.

To the motion so amended, the Government, through Mr. G. A. HAMILTON, consented.

RAILWAY IN THE HIGHLANDS OF SCOTLAND.

Mr. J. STUART submitted a resolution pledging Parliament to grant assistance towards the formation of a railway communication between Oban, in Argyleshire, and Glasgow, with the view to provide employment for the people and to improve the condition of the country. He quoted the grants made for facilitating Irish railroads as justifying the application.

Mr. HAGGERSTON supported the motion.

Sir G. SINCLAIRD was opposed to the granting of public money for such works on principle, and in the present case especially, when the object was to form a railroad through an uninhabited and mountainous district.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, without laying it down as a rule that the State should in no case assist in forwarding enterprises of this nature, thought no sufficient grounds had been shown, justifying such assistance in the present case. He did not deny that a railroad would be an advantage to the district, but he reminded the mover that there was an annual grant applicable to such purposes. Supposing the object to be a proper one, and it were put forward on no sad date, an application made to the Loan Commissioners of Public Works for a grant would meet with due attention.

Sir A. CAMPBELL reminded the House that the proposed railway partook more of a public than a private work.

Mr HUME was satisfied that the only remedy for the distress in the Highlands was an pendent. He no sooner saw that such result to the country from a railroad in the district in question, where there was no traffic to make it remunerative

After some further conversation, Mr. F. SCOTT moved the adjournment of the debate for a fortnight, to give the Chancellor of the Exchequer an opportunity of further considering the subject, which was agreed to.

MORTMAIN.

On the motion of Mr. HEADLAM, the select committee on the laws of mortmain was reinstated.

RIBBON OUTRAGES IN IRELAND.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL for IRELAND brought in a motion of which he had given notice before his coming into office, namely, for a select committee to inquire into the state of those parts of the counties of ARMAGH, MONAGHAN, and LOUTH which were referred to in her Majesty's Speech, into the immediate cause of crime and outrage in those districts, and into the efficiency of the laws, and of their administration, for the suppression of such crime and outrage. He had no doubt that there existed in the districts in question a vast confederation for the purpose of crime, which if not put down by law, would eventually put law down; and he adduced statistics to show the fearful amount of criminality in those localities, where it was found impossible to obtain convictions. Additional crimes had been committed since the Speech from the Throne, and new notices of intended murder had been given. He explained the state of the law in Ireland, and the organization of the Ribbonmen, and insisted upon the necessity of special measures to put an end to such a system. He intended to submit to the Government the result of his labours on the question, and he hoped at no distant period to see a simplified code of laws applicable to the circumstances of the districts in question

Mr HATCHELL supported the motion, and entered into a vindication of his own conduct while in office.

Mr. M'CULLAGH, while admitting the distressing circumstances stated by Mr. Napier, attributed them in part to the inequality of the law in Ireland as regarded the rich and the poor respectively.

After a discussion of some length, the motion was agreed to.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

On the order for the second reading of the Friendly Societies Bill, Mr. SOTHERON stated that it differed in no important particular from the law which passed two years ago; but it had been deemed better to withdraw it, and introduce another bill to continue the present act for two years longer. The bill was accordingly withdrawn.

The reports of the Committees of Supply and of Ways and Means were brought up and agreed to.—Adjourned at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. T. BATESON took the oaths and his seat for Londonderry.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Mr. ADDERLEY presented a petition from the municipality of Cape Town, expressing their unqualified attachment to her Majesty's person, and gratitude for her Majesty's liberal intentions in granting a constitution to the Cape; at the same time bitterly complaining that the local Government had taken steps to delay the passage of the necessary ordinance through their House, by interposing a number of objectionable ordinances; that they had appropriated the revenues of the colony by means of the old superseded Council for a quarter of a century to come, and spread jealousies and dissensions between the coloured races and the European population, which might altogether frustrate the objects of the new Constitution. They prayed the House to take every means in its power to induce her Majesty to refuse her assent to any such objectionable ordinances, and to make every effort for carrying into effect the constitution without delay. The hon. member hoped very shortly to call the attention of the House to the subject of this very important petition. (Hear, hear.)

MANCHESTER AND SALFORD EDUCATION BILL.

Mr. BROTHERTON moved the second reading of the Manchester and Salford Education Bill, which he as a deputation presented by a large proportion of the ratepayers of Manchester and Salford. It was objected that the bill should be a public, and not a private one; but he was willing, if it should be read a second time, that it should subsequently be treated as a public bill, or that it should be sent to a committee up-stairs.

Mr. M. GIBSON moved as an amendment, the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the state of education in Manchester and Salford and the adjoining townships, and whether it was not advisable that some further provision should be made, and in what manner, for the promotion of education by means of local rates raised within the same boroughs and townships. The right hon. gentleman, in adverting to objectionable provisions of the bill, said that the only interest which the Jews would possess under it would be that of paying the rates, while the Roman Catholics could only avail themselves of its advantages by also paying the rates, and something that their children should be taught the authorised version of the Scriptures.

Mr. ROEBUCK seconded the amendment, and said that if the bill could be treated as a public bill, he should not undertake that there was which might not be so treated. It was no objection in that respect, that he appealed to the Secretary of State for the Home Department not to allow it to proceed any further.

Mr. WALPOLE said the promoters of the bill deserved great credit for their exertions in supporting this bill, and the more so that it did not propose to separate religion from secular education; but still there were strong reasons why the House should not allow the bill to be read a second time. The bill contained a great public principle, which, if agreed to in this case, would afford a precedent for the extension of the system to large towns. He was so deeply impressed with the necessity of making religion the foundation of all education, that he thought the voluntary efforts of every sect should be left uncontrolled; and, while opposing the second reading of the bill, he would express a hope that Mr. M. Gibson would consent to alter the last words of his motion with respect to promoting education by means of local rates.

Lord J. RUSSELL thought it would be advisable to adopt the amendment instead of reading the bill a second time, though, had the question been upon the second reading only, he would have supported it. He hoped, therefore, his hon friend Mr Brotherton would not press the bill to a second reading.

Mr. CARDWELL said the promoters of the bill, if it should proceed no further, had reaped the reward of their labours in having the whole subject referred for full inquiry to a committee of that House.

Mr. W. PATTEN hoped that Mr. Brotherton would not press the second reading to a division, but accept the amendment.

Mr. BROTHERTON said he had great pleasure in acceding to the amendment, which, he believed, would lead to the accomplishment of all that the promoters sought for. He would, therefore, postpone for one month the second reading of the bill.

Sir R. INGLIS said he objected to taxing the people of England for the purposes of education except in accordance with the principles of the Established Church.

Mr. W. J. FOX expressed his satisfaction that the subject was to be referred for full inquiry to a committee.

Colonel THOMPSON contended, that, in a country containing a great diversity of religious creeds, if the path was to be taxed for the purposes of education, that education should be such as none of them could object to.

After some observations from Mr SLANEY,

Mr. M. GIBSON said, he would not press the words objected to by Mr. Walpole, provided it was understood that their omission would not limit the inquiries of the committee.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, that the object was not to limit the inquiries of the committee.

The amendment was then agreed to.

PHARMACY BILL.

The PHARMACY Bill was read a second time, and referred to a select committee.

Mr. TOWNLEY moved for leave to bring in a Bill to abolish Property Qualification for members of Parliament.

Mr. WALPOLE said he would not oppose the introduction of the bill, but he must reserve to himself the right of dealing with the subject as he might think proper upon the second reading.

After a few words from Colonel SIBTHORP, leave was given to bring in the bill.

On the motion of Mr. PETRIE, leave was given to bring in a Bill to continue the Friendly Societies Act for two years.

Adjourned at half-past three o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Lord BEAUMONT gave notice of his intention to ask the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs for information upon the subject of the recent events in the Argentine Republic, in connexion with the maritime and commercial interests of the country. He also intended to ask for the production of the correspondence that had taken place between foreign countries and this country on the subject of foreign refugees and the treatment of English women in foreign countries. He would also take the opportunity of calling the noble Lord's attention to a rumour that was abroad respecting another outrage committed upon a British officer at Leghorn.

The Earl of MALMESBURY had no objection to answer the questions at once In reference to the first, he could assure the noble Baron that the Government were fully alive to the interests of this country in connexion with recent events in the Argentine Republic. In respect to the second question, the Government had no objection to the production of the correspondence referred to. And, in answer to the third question, the facts of the case were these:—A petty officer belonging to her Majesty's ship Firebrand, while on shore at Leghorn, and dressed in his uniform, was seized by a gendarme with very little or no provocation, dragged to the station-house, and there maltreated and loaded with chains. On the representation of the Interference of the Secretary of Legation, an apology was made for this outrage, and the officer who had arrested the marine was committed to prison for eight days.

VOLUNTEER RIFLE CORPS.

The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH said, that, after due consideration, the present Government thought that the decision arrived at by the late Government was a just and wise one. When the Militia Bill came under discussion, he would be prepared to show that they had acted in opposition without foundation.

CRIMINAL LUNATICS.

The Earl of SHAFTESBURY moved that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying that her Majesty may be graciously pleased to take into her consideration the propriety of appointing a Royal Commission, with the view to the amendment of the laws relating to lunatics generally. The motion of the noble Earl could not properly be assented to by their Lordships, inasmuch as it involved the question of a sum of money for the erection of a building, and this would be an encroachment upon the peculiar privileges of the other House. He trusted, therefore, that the noble Earl would withdraw his motion.

After a few words from Lord CRANWORTH,

The Earl of SHAFTESBURY consented to withdraw his motion, feeling perfectly satisfied with the assurance given him by the noble Earl at the head of the Government.

The motion was accordingly withdrawn.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

OUTRAGE UPON A BRITISH OFFICER ABROAD.

Colonel RAWDON said he had seen a letter which mentioned that a British officer in full uniform, belonging to the Royal Marines, had been arrested at Leghorn by the Austrian authorities.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said he believed it was quite incorrect that a British officer in full uniform had been cut down at Leghorn by the Austrian authorities. Information had reached the Government that a petty officer in the Marines, being on leave at Leghorn, had been extremely maltreated by the Tuscan police. The captain of her Majesty's vessel, the Firebrand immediately communicated with Mr. Scarlett, the British Minister at Florence. Considerable correspondence had taken place between Mr. Scarlett and the Austrian Government, and the head of the Tuscan police, who was involved in the transaction, had been imprisoned for eight days. That was all the information that had reached the Government.

Lord PALMERSTON wished to put a question in connexion with this affair. Some considerable time ago, an unmanly outrage, of a very aggravated character, was made upon a British subject. It was an attack by an armed officer at the head of a regiment on an unarmed British subject at Florence. He wished to know whether the Tuscan Government had inflicted any punishment upon the officer who had so misconducted himself, or whether any other reparation had been made to the British Crown?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER reminded the noble Lord that he had not given notice of his question; but he had to reply, that the Government had instituted inquiry respecting the conduct of the Tuscan officer. The correspondence which had passed was approaching to a speedy termination, and he believed the result would be satisfactory to the House. (Hear)

Lord J. RUSSELL asked whether reparation for the injury had been promised by the Tuscan Government?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said he should be able to give a more satisfactory reply if the noble Lord would give notice of his question. (Hear.)

INCOME-TAX.

Mr. HUME wished to know if it was intended to renew the Income-tax Committee of Inquiry of last year?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said he should have no objection to such a proceeding.

IRISH SAVINGS-BANKS.

Mr. REYNOLDS brought the case of the Cuffe-street Savings-bank under consideration, and moved that the House should resolve itself into a committee on the 23d of March, to consider the losses sustained by the depositors in the Cuffe-street Savings-bank, Dublin; and that an address be presented to her Majesty, praying that her most gracious Majesty may be pleased to take into her consideration their case, and grant them compensation for their losses.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in opposing the motion, said that in strict justice he did not think that those losses were entitled to compensation, and, although he did not regret the £30 000 which had been given to the depositors by way of compensation, yet he must regard that sum as having been given as a settlement of the question. Under these circumstances, he hoped the hon. gentleman would withdraw his motion.

After some discussion the House divided, and the motion was negatived by a majority of 169 to 49.

Mr. SLANEY obtained leave to bring in a bill to legalise the formation of industrial and provident partnerships

The House was soon afterwards counted out

A few days ago, the Margaret, of Perth, was loaded at Ferry-Port-on-Craig by the Prussian house, Adolph Brezsig, of Dundee, with a full cargo of rye for Stettin. It is only to be accounted for by the almost famine now existing in many parts of Germany, that a country from which we annually import corn to so large an extent should be now buying from us.

On Wednesday afternoon the company of Grocers distributed, at their hall, in the Poultry, to a number of their poor brethren, a sum of £100 and upwards. The applicants were many in number, and appeared thankful for the bounty bestowed on them.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

One of the latest contributions to the League fund is a subscription which came to hand on Monday morning, of £2000 from the Ebbw-vale Iron Company, South Wales. This is the largest subscription given yet; but it may be mentioned that one gentleman who has given £1000 to the fund offered to make it £5000, and has stated that he should hold himself open to the demand, should the emergency require such a sacrifice. The total subscriptions up to yesterday were upwards of £57,000.

The Liverpool police have, during the last few days, been making a regular onslaught on the lounging fraternity. Between fifty and sixty of all ages, sizes, countries, and colours were yesterday brought before the magistrates, and summarily dealt with. Some sturdy fellows, negroes and Malays, a few of whom had been within the grasp of the law before, looked as the gift begging was only the mildest pursuit which they adopted for a livelihood, robbery and violence being evidently to them more congenial. Amongst the crowd of prisoners was a hoary mariner, upwards of 112 years of age. He was handed over to the care of the parish workhouse.

At the conclusion of Dr. Percy's lecture on iron, on Monday evening, being the last of the course delivered at the Museum of Practical Geology to artisans, a memorial numerously signed was presented to Sir Henry De la Beche, and the other lecturers at this establishment, testifying to the gratitude of the work men seen attend ng these lectures for the valuable information they had received, and the uniform kindness extended to them during their attendance on the course.

The late King of Siam was opposed to intercourse with foreign countries. His son, the present King, on the contrary, has shown himself anxious to pursue a different policy; has ordered a steam-boat to be built, and has encouraged machinery, and surrounded himself by the Ministers known to be favourable to commerce. The Manchester Commercial Association, who have recently directed their attention to the subject, appear to think that such an opportunity for extending our foreign relations ought not to be lost.

On Saturday the sixth annual report of the visitors of Maynooth College, signed by the Duke of Leinster and the other commissioners, was printed. The visitation was made on the 2d December last. There were 516 students present, two absent on leave, and five on account of illness. No complaints were made. The oath of allegiance had been taken, and the resident students would take the same at the next quarter sessions. Further repairs would be required. The commissioners consider the result of their visitation to be most satisfactory.

In compliance with the determination of her Majesty's Government to form a Penitentiary Establishment in Australia, into a convict settlement, orders have been issued that a transport-ship should be fitted up to convey a batch of 500 male convicts to the colony. The convict guard will consist of 75 enrolled out-pensioners (of Chelsea Hospital, who will remain at Fremantle as military colonists.

W. Reynolds, Esq., of Thurning House, Norfolk, had been a few nights ago attacked near his own park by two footpads, who, after a long struggle, fled from him, and took from his person £83 in notes and gold, and two gold guineas, with which they made off.

THE GOLD FIELDS OF AUSTRALIA.

The Indian mail has brought accounts from Sydney and Melbourne (Victoria) to the 10th and 12th of December respectively, which show that the "golden harvest" of Australia equals, if it does not surpass, that of California. From these accounts it appears that 13,000 ounces were brought into Sydney as one week's supply, and that the Port Phillip (now Victoria) contribution was 29,600 ounces in a fortnight. Those totals, however, must be presumed to be beyond the average, since they would show a production at the rate of nearly £5,000,000 per annum. The following is an extract of a letter on the subject:—

"Dec 6 1851.

"When you hear that by escort from west and south 10,000 ounces came into Sydney, and 2000 ounces by private hands, yesterday; and that into Melbourne the last escort, of the 28th of November, brought in from Ballarat and Mount Alexander 13,000 ounces, and left 6000 ounces behind, and that for one week's working it was well begin to see. If you had not already believed my confident predictions, what an astounding thing these discoveries are.

"It is my opinion that Australia will send to England in 1852 at least £3 000,000 sterling in gold.

"The day a nugget of quartz has been sold by auction (having been found one morning at Louisa Creek by a common man named Harbott) for the sum of £1185."

"Dec. 13, 1851.

"40 000 ounces gold, value upwards of £132,000, go home in the Alert. At Melbourne the receipts have been for the last two weeks 13,000 and 16,000 ounces, or 29,000 ounces in fourteen day."

Nothing can show the effect of the gold discoveries at Victoria more than the fluctuation in the price of flour. So much fear is entertained for the standing crops, that the demands for want of the harvest, that the price of flour had again risen. The Melbourn Argus quotes flour at £18 per ton for fine, and £17 for seconds.

Under date December 5, we have a statement from Melbourn to the effect that the discoveries at the mines at Mount Alexander have caused the greatest excitement, and numerous crowds abandon their homes, directing their steps thither. The gold is more generally spread, more abundant, and easier gathered, than at Ballarat. At Mount Alexander, as elsewhere, some are very fortunate, others less so, and some again truly pitiable The correspo ident of the Geelong Intelligencer announces that the gold is embedded in iron ore, and that it is found thirty-two feet below the surface. This discovery was recently made by Dr. Johnson. The Argus estimates the amount of gold received at Melbourn and Geelong since the commencement of the licensing, about two months, at £201,60, reckoning the gold at £3 per ounce. A Ballarat correspondent of the Melbourn Daily News mentions that the rains had in some measure subsided, and mining operations were renewed with great vigour at Mount Alexander. Several of the gold diggers were attacked, and new ones were being opened, which circumstance had scattered the miners over a wider space. The miners were suffering much from their toilsome labour. Backsmiths were making rapid returns at their trade, and they were charging 10s. per week for keeping hoes in repair. Melbourne agricultural labourers refuse to engage at a yearly salary of £65. They will not hire themselves for a longer period than one week, and at £84. per week. The Government commissioners had made the report on the extent and capabilities of the mines, and they record their unanimous opinion that the mines offer highly remunerative employment to at least 100,000 persons, or nearly four times the number at present engaged in the work.

At Sydney a preliminary meeting had been held at the Star Hotel, for the formation of a New South Wales Gold Mining Company, and nearly 800 shares of £5 each were subscribed for before the chairman quitted his seat.

POSTAGE OF NEWSPAPERS IN INDIA.—The Overland Star of Calcutta, under date Feb. 7, says on the subject:—"There is one matter of great moment and gain, private and general importance, just now being agitated here, to which we would draw attention. The proprietors and editors of the Calcutta papers, justly thinking that they and their property had been grossly wronged, injured, and depreciated, by the recommendation of the postal commission here, to continue the high and ruinous tax on the carriage of news) spers by the public post; and knowing that the commission's report, with the Governor-General's minutes and recommendation, were going home by this mail, have addressed a petition to her Lordship, soliciting his favour in their behalf, and praying for his influence and interference to remove or lighten the present ruinous tax upon knowledge, as far as it is conveyed and diffused by the public post."

Yesterday week, the officers of the 91st (Argyle) Regiment, at the barracks, Belfast, gave a grand ball in honour of the Marquis and Marchioness of Downshire. The noble Marquis was unavoidably prevented accompanying the Marchioness. The mess room was very tastefully fitted up for dancing, the decorations including the splendid colours of the regiment; and an elegant supper was served in the hall. The officers had invited the élite of the neighbourhood of Belfast to meet their noble guests, and the fête was remarkably brilliant.

MODEL OF THE ARCTIC REGIONS.—We have been much pleased and instructed by a visit to a model of the Arctic Regions, in a room devoted to it in Mr. Wyld's exhibition at the Globe, in Leicester-square. It shows the physical construction of that part of the world, and exhibits the elevations on the surface and in nature. The route of the Franklin missing vessels is also laid down with plainness and accuracy, in such a way as to be easily traced and understood. The investigation will prove interesting to the inquirer, besides being in itself a work of high art, imply ing enlarged observation, both in detail and as a whole. With regard to the Globe itself, various improvements have, we find, been recently introduced; it has been repainted, and the galleries have been rendered more convenient for an extensive view of the entire model.

MR. ALBERT SMITH'S ASCENT OF MONT BLANC.

WITH many of the particulars of Mr. Smith's ascent of Mont Blanc, last August, our readers are doubtless already acquainted, from his letter in the Journals, to the conclusion of which the personal narrative is due. To the tourist himself, however, was a thing to be desired, and had, indeed, been early promised. To the fulfilment of that promise many have looked with eagerness, particularly as it was accompanied by the assurance that Mr. William Beverley, the companion of his tour, would paint some pictures worthily illustrative of the sublime scenes visited by the travellers. Expectation has not been disappointed, now that the long-wished-for exhibition has taken place. On Monday evening, at the Egyptian Hall, Mr. Albert Smith opened his audience with the deridorated personal narrative aforesaid; and delighted them with Mr. Beverley's pictorial illustrations. The room has been especially fitted up for the occasion the lecture-table and procenium of the occasional stage being ornamented with greenery and gaily tinted curtains, calculated to heighten the spectator's delight and assist his fancy in pursuing the thread of the discourse, and identifying the more salient features of the scenes to be successively display ed.

On Mr. Smith's appearance he was warmly applauded, and he began his lecture under the most favourable auspices. Nevertheless, he thought it courteous and befitting to bespeak indulgence for any possible mistake, owing to the newness of the task, and machinery. But he soon plunged into the subject; and we found him at Geneva, having migrated, with everybody else, at the close of the season, from London. The picture of Geneva was such as to give full assurance that the scenes would be excellent. The view, taken from the Hôtel des Bergues, presented in the distance the Salève, the Jura, and Mont Blanc. On his arrival at Chillon, Mr. Smith introduced us to an American, and a literary spy—humourous sketches both—though not quite equal to those that varied so effectively "The Overland Mail." But the present subject obviously admits less of that kind of episode than the former did. The contusion of the American's mind relative to Lord Byron and his doings, defining the Prisoner of Chillon, Bonnivard, was a clever bit of character—dangerous ground for the tourist on Lake Geneva. The cave engraved upon the next page), over which the tourists had to pass by means of a ladder—a crazy method of transition, where a single slip of the foot might be fatal—was the traveller's next halt thereafter of note in depth. This scene is comparatively beautiful; but there are many others of equal merit: in fact, the whole series of the Alpine accents is splendidly painted, exhibiting those stupendous scenes in all their grandeur and terror. We may just mention in proof those of the grands Mulets Rocks by night, the Grand Plateau by Moonlight, and the hazardous ascent of the Mur de la Côte. Mr. Smith appears to have been quite exhausted just before he reached the summit, and to have experienced some of the pleasures of sweet repose. But he was well protected by his friends, and at length he stood on the top, in triumph, without fee ing ill, for he was so overwarm that he was unable to attend to the view, and fell off immediately to sleep. During this part, Mr. Smith treated his audience with a specimen of the hurdy-gurdy music of the gnides, and the manner in which they sing scraps of Savoyard songs. The lecture itself concludes in a Parisian café, accompanied with a metrical description of an Englishman's way of behaving at a restaurant and at a theatre in Paris. The whole was highly interesting, and thrown off in a genial mood, characteristic, and full of bonhommie, which led viva voce of the speaker never warned either himself or his hearers. The performance must become highly popular.

THE RAILWAY NOTE-BOOK;

OR,

JOTTINGS IN THE STATION, THE TERMINUS, AND THE TRAIN.

BY ANGUS B. REACH.

GRADUALLY gaining speed, the train glides out of the terminus, and along strange wildernesses of crossing and recrossing rails, with policemen holding down levers and waving little red and green flags, and by long rows of empty carriages and never-ending processions of stationary trucks, and through a mountain region of heaped-up coke, and by great buildings with huge open doors—the hospitals for sick engines, in the interior of which you can see the metallic patients in all sorts of uncomfortable postures, while the medical gentlemen employed bang them with hammers and screw holes unflinchingly into their vital parts—and along little snatches of by-lines where fidget and sputter and steam locomotives, well and hearty, and apparently anxious to be set to work, now giving a loud panting puff, now advancing two or three yards, like a horse pawing the ground, again being backed by the curbing hand of the driver; while the stoker, armed with a bundle of greasy rags, and a sort of oil-teapot, performs a wonderful series of gymnastic evolutions under the locomotive and over it, getting the lubricating fluid into queer secret joints and out-of-the-way holes, and making the steel rods and valves and levers shine like silver. Again, you will observe engines advancing and retiring, and running from one line of rail to another, never apparently at peace, always advancing and retreating, always fidgetty and unquiet, wandering and gliding and sliding about, like restless ghosts doomed to everlasting craving after motion.

On some lines, after passing through the limbo of the great railway yards, and goods and out stations, and between long arrays of brick wall, with iron girdings and supports, and bridges over head and railings along the top of the defile, with garden flowers clustering among them, you emerge right into the country, speedily leaving behind you the tall lines of stuccoed houses, shells of terraces, and inchoate squares, which are rising round London. On other lines, again, you speed for a mile or two over roofs, the eye dwelling upon a wilderness of tiles, slates, and smoking chimney-pots—catching picturesque glimpses of streets radiating from below you—men, women, and horses foreshortened—dreary open spaces heaped with lime and clay, ready for building, and generally tenanted by troops of playing boys, with exclusive glimpses of backyards with flagstaffs, and back-gardens more arid and bare than the yard and private water-butts and washhouses, and a complete and compendious panoramic view of the domestic arrangements of the neighbourhood, as visible through the uncurtained windows of back-parlours, bedrooms, and garrets—gentlemen standing before infinitesimal mirrors, shaving; and ladies, like so many mermaids, combing out their silken locks. A minute or two more, and you shoot through the big gasworks and waterworks, and over the barge-crowded canals, which form the fortifications of London, and you are in the country, with meadows and fields, and swelling hills, all green and fresh and fragrant, with clumps of forest trees, and hedgerows, and coppice, stretching bright and fair around you.

The first few miles are generally got over in silence. Gentlemen who have bought newspapers are skimming the cream of the leading articles, being greatly aided thereto by the size of the print, as well as the interest of the matter. When they come to turn one page, and transfer their attention from what printers call "Leaded Bourgeois" to "Solid Minion," the shaking of the carriage becomes much more apparent, and the peruser loses all interest in the report of a Manchester meeting, only seven columns and a half long, or an argument of half the length but double the dreariness in the Court of Chancery. As for the ladies, who do not often read, they settle themselves into a state of passive apathy, which is neither sleeping nor waking, and appear to take no sort of interest in any outward events henceforth, unless it be to start and give a little simultaneous scream when the first up-train passes, or languidly to ask at a station, "Pray what place is this?" If you told them Seringapatam or Nova Zembla, the great majority would thank you mincingly for the information, and forget it the next minute. Here and there, however, you have a strong-minded and strong-fingered woman, who sets to at crochet or Berlin work, or some of those species of unprofitable hard labour which woman's nature is continually condemning her to—for three months or six months, as the case may be—for some secret offence totally unknown to us men, but no doubt committed against us.

Railway conversation is not, as a general rule, brilliant. It starts, flickers for a moment, and then dies away. As thus:—

1st Passenger.—Fine morning.

2nd Pass.—Yes for the time of year.

1st Pass.—Goodish pace.

2nd Pass.—Ha—you may say that.

2nd Pass.—Another sort of thing from the old coaches.

1st Pass.—Ah! Wonderful thing, sir, is steam—and really only in its infancy yet

Dus original remark seems to settle the question, and the long dialogue does a natural death.

Now and then there is a dismal passenger, who enquires deferentially if the company have heard of the awful railway catastrophe on the North-north-west line, when eighty-two people were smashed outright, and a hundred and seventy-six desperately wounded. The company having digested this rueful intelligence, the dismal man produces a "Bradshaw" and informs the listeners that the train is exactly in the position of that to which the catastrophe occurred—that there is a luggage train ahead which hardly goes on at all, and an express train behind which never known to stop! After this there is a dreary pause, and people beg n to look out of the windows, and compare the current time with the moments at which the train ought to stop at [illegible]; and this goes on until the unquietude has, as it always does, worn itself away

"Bradshaw" is sure to be a well-studied book during the journey. Indeed, we might divide railway passengers into two grand classes—those who can make head or tail of "Bradshaw," and those who cannot. The first class are generally the experienced hands, who can combine two or three pages, and follow the tune from one line to another, and are never put out by branches, and know the meaning of the little bars under certain figures, and never mistake the fares for the hours or the up-trains for the down, and who will turn you up the Great Western, or the South-Western, or the Midlands and Manchester, without searching half an hour among the advertisements and the steamboat announcements. But to nine-tenths of the passengers "Bradshaw" is as puzzling as a volume of Sanscrit. They cannot tell but how 7.45 can mean a quarter to eight, or 2 [illegible] the breaks in the trains throw them out a-together; and they are sure never to observe the magic letters A.M. and P.M., but to jog on tranquilly tracing the trains, and settling in their minds that the parliamentary leaves Exeter at 6 in the evening instead of the morning, and congratulating themselves that they will be in Liverpool in nice time for dinner, namely, at five o'clock the next morning. Occasionally a Daniel appears and expounds "Bradshaw" for the benefit of the whole carriage. This is frequently the commercial gentleman, who has the whole book by heart, and who, having enlightened the company, takes his reward by trying to draw out a couple of silent young ladies, each of whom he calls "Miss," and asks if she is fond of dancing.

The battle of the window is a species of single combat very frequently witnessed on railways. Generally the gentleman with his back to the engine lets the glass, which has been up in coming through a tunnel or something of the kind, down. The gentleman opposite says nothing, but puts it up. Upon this the first aggressor looks fierce, and puts it down again, with a muttered remark about his not liking to be smothered. In a moment up goes the pane again, with an ejaculation from the opposite side against his being condemned to catch his death of cold. Sometimes the least impudent of the combatants gives way at an early stage of the dispute. Occasionally it is carried on with singular determination

Up-window Man.—Beg your pardon, sir, but really, in the state of my health—must have window up. Doctor, sir—Doctor. (Puts it up.)

Down-window Man.—Really, sir, can't help the state of your health—very sorry for your health—but can't be smothered, sir. (Lets it down.)

Up-window Man.—Why, sir—what was the window made for? (Putting it up.)

Down-window Man.—Made for, sir?—to be put down, sir. (Puts it down.)

Up-window Man.—Really, sir—this is too bad. I'll catch my death of cold I positively cannot allow it. (Puts window up.)

Down-window Man.—And I, sir, require a proper supply of oxygen, and I will have it. (Puts window down.)

Up-window Man.—I shall appeal to the guard, sir, at the next station.

Down-window Man.—So shall I, sir. I did not enter this train to be asphyxiated, sir.

The most probable [illegible] that at length a compromise is entered upon, and that the air breathed by the atmospheric loving gentleman is like a mixture of porter and ale—half and half.

The above sketch applies tolerably well to both first and second class conversation. Only in the latter there is sure to be a fling at the carriages, and many significant remarks on the hardness of the seats. The excuse for grumbling at the directors is, however, after all, a sort of moral cushion which John Bull loves to sit upon in the spirit, as much as he dislikes planting himself on the hard, unflinching, rattling boards in the flesh.

The third-class passenger or "traveller" is not so dainty. He makes no complaint of the seats, but stows himself away as comfortably as possible. Seldom intending to patronise the refreshment stations, he brings in his own lingo, his "prog" with him, and not being able to keep long from it, speedily unfolds the greasy sheet of a threepenny newspaper, and takes therefrom bunches of bread, a screw of salt, and goodly slices of beef or bacon, which speedily vanish and are seen no more. He afterwards produces a soda-water bottle three parts filled with a dark liquid; after partaking copiously of which, if he be a "traveller" of a hospitable nature, he offers his neighbour a "drain." An implement destined for a purpose similar to the soda-water bottle is occasionally seen in the other class carriages, but there it is metaphorically and elegantly called a "pocket pistol;" and the glass being covered with neat-fitting leather or wicker-work, no man, save he who tastes, can say whether its contents be not pure water or harmless milk. However, many people have their [illegible]

But station after station we have seen come and go; at some we have stopped, with a mighty blowing of steam and [illegible] from the locomotive, and grinding, and scrunching, and squeaking; yelling breaks, putting one's very teeth on edge, and producing a smell of fire strong enough to make us think of the accident on the Versailles Railway; and some we have roared and rushed through, passing them like a vision of momentarily seen walls and trucks, and dim ghosts of figures upon the platform; and some of the passengers have caught the name of the place, and others have not; and scores and scores of miles have we sped over, of country fair and rich or naked and bare—by villages and hamlets, and skirting big towns, and over hollow country lanes and great broad desolate roads—deserts, since the "good old coaching days" are over—and along canals, with gliding barges and lonely lock-houses; and through deep, dark, awful tunnels, roaring by, and along high embankments, scattering the burning coke from the flying furnace; and now the speed slackens again, and the engine whistles again, and a pleasurable sensation is observed to be diffused among the passengers as they remark to each other, "We stop for five minutes at the next station for refreshment."

JOHN BRAHAM.

THE erudite M. Fétis, the musical historian and director of the Brussels Conservatoire, has written in his "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens" as follows:—"Braham died in London of the cholera, in the month of August, 1834." The Morning Herald certainly did announce the death of the great tenor at that time, and published his obituary, but Braham was enabled to assure the editor, in his own hand-writing, that he was alive, and the audiences of the London Wednesday Concerts, at Exeter-hall, are actually in a position to appreciate the still astonishing vocal powers of the most distinguished singer the country ever produced. In all the biographies of Braham it is stated that he was born in London, in 1772. This is, however, a mistake as to the date, as Braham first saw the light on the 20th of March, 1777; consequently, on the very day that his portrait is presented by our Artists in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS he is seventy-five years of age. What an extraordinary series of political and artistic changes Braham has seen in his time! He has lived under four reigns, and has been himself a prince among artists, as well as an artist among princes. In 1784 he became the pupil of Leoni Lee; and at the age of ten years made his first appearance on any stage at the Royalty Theatre, as Cupid, in an occasional piece in honour of Queen Charlotte (the consort of George III.): Master Braham sang an air, composed by Mr. Reeve, "Gentle god, whose sacred powers"—an invocation to Hymen. During his stay, under John Palmer's management (Gentleman Palmer, who died whilst playing the Stranger), the great vocal effort of the boy Braham was Dr. Arne's bravura, "The soldier tired," which always elicited a fervent encore. In 1789 his voice broke, and he began to study the pianoforte. He soon afterwards lost his master, Leoni Lee, who went abroad, but he obtained the kind patronage of the Goldsmids, in the City. By careful attention Braham recovered his voice, and Mr. Ashe, the celebrated flute-player, having accidentally heard him, advised him to accept an engagement for Bath. There he took lessons of Rauzzini, an Italian professor, resident in that city; and soon Mr. Braham began to teach, as well as sing—one of his pupils, in 1795, being Lady Nelson, then Mrs. Nelson, who was desirous of learning Italian songs to please her husband, Captain Nelson. Braham's fame soon spread to London; and Stephen Storace, the composer, went expressly to Bath to hear him, and then engaged the young tenor for Drury Lane Theatre in the spring of 1796, to make his début in Storace's opera, "Mahmoud." The composer died before Braham appeared, at the close of the season. Such was his success, that, in the next season, he stepped from the boards of Drury Lane Theatre to the King's Theatre (the Italian Opera-house), where he sang with the famed Madame Banti in "Zemira and Azor." Being resolved to visit France and Italy for further improvement, Braham first went to Paris, with the intention of remaining only a few days; but he resided there for eight months. His first concert (at which the price of the ticket was a louis) was at the Elysée Bourbon, under the patronage of Madame Josephine, the wife of General Bonaparte. He was offered, but declined, a lucrative engagement for the Italian Opera-house in Paris. His first appearance in Italy was at the Pergola in Florence, in an opera by Basili; Braham played Ulysses, and although the Telemachus was six feet high, and the English tenor only about five feet three inches, such was the power of his singing as to overcome the risibility of the excitable Italians at this disparity of size between the father and son. It was at Florence that Braham was introduced to the great tenor David, who paid him the high compliment, when asked who he thought the best tenor in Italy, of saying, "Dopo di me, il Inglese"—"Next to me, the Englishman." From Florence Braham went to Milan and Genoa. At the last-mentioned city he sang with Marchesi, the Veluti of that day, in the opera of "Lodoiska," thirty consecutive nights. At Genoa he studied composition under Isola. The siege of Genoa took place whilst Braham was in the city. At Leghorn Braham was much noticed by the hero of the Nile. He was almost every day at Nelson's residence, and generally dined with the Admiral twice a week. One morning his Lordship requested Braham to play a march, which Nelson intended should be his funeral march. Whilst Braham was playing over and examining the composition, the hero of Alexandria, General Abercrombie, was announced. Nelson told Braham not to leave the room, and to continue his task, during which the two illustrious commanders were walking up and down the saloon, keeping up an animated conversation in an under tone. Strange destiny of the tenor. He had no presentiment, at the time, that he should first compose the scene, "The Death of Abercromby," and, lastly, the air, "The Death of Nelson," and that he should hereafter sing these two compositions of his own to thousands and thousands of excited listeners.

From Leghorn Braham visited Naples, and from that city he went to Venice. It was here that Cimarosa composed his last lyric work, "Artemisia," for Braham; but, like Storace with "Mahmoud," dying before the opera was completed, the English tenor singing in the service, with Naldi, at the great composer's funeral, with such deep pathos as to profoundly affect the auditory. After singing at Trieste and Hamburgh Mr. Braham returned to London, having accepted an engagement at Covent Garden Theatre. He appeared in an opera, "Chains of the Heart," written by Prince Hoare, the music by Reeve and Mazzinghi. Braham's triumph was transcendant, and for half a century he has preserved his popularity, even to the very present moment, when his voice is "Rome in ruins," great and glorious even in decay, the genius of theartist surviving the inroads of time.

During the period of Braham's engagements at the two patent theatres, the virtual destruction of [illegible]vileges has been indeed a fatal blow to the [illegible]s, as well as for opera, he composed music for [illegible]e Cabinet," "The English Fleet," "Out of Place," "Thirty Thousand," "Family Quarrels," "The Paragraph," "Kais," "Americans," "The Devil's Bridge," "False Alarms," "Zuma," "Nawensky," &c. It would fill a volume to follow Mr. Braham through his various engagements. From 1806 to 1816 he [illegible] with Mrs. Billington, Madame Rassani (aunt of Grisi), Madam Fodor, &c., at the King's Theatre [illegible] Sesto when Mozart's "Clemenza di [illegible]" was produced in this country. At the Lyceum he was the original Max in Weber's "Der Freyschutz;" and that composer wrote expressly for Braham the music of Sir Huon in Planché's "Oberon," produced on the 12th of April, 1826, at Covent Garden Theatre. In 1835 Mr. Braham built and opened the St. James's Theatre, and in the same year opened the Colosseum—both speculations proving most disastrous, and the fruits of his labours of years were swallowed up. The last character on the lyric stage created by Braham was William Tell, in Rossini's opera, at Drury Lane Theatre, in 1839. The part is written for a barytone, but amateurs will not easily forget the exquisite pathos with which Braham sang the air of the hero, prior to his shooting the apple from his son's head.

Mr. Braham was married to Miss Bolton, of Ardwick, near Manchester, in 1816. He is now a widower with six children: two daughters married (one the Countess Dowager of Waldegrave, who is united to Mr Harcourt, her third husband), and four sons, three of whom are in the profession; namely, Charles Braham, the tenor, who is studying in Italy; Hamilton Braham, the basso, who is very popular in Germany; and Augustus Braham, the tenor, formerly in the army, who lately accompanied Miss Catherine Hayes in her tour in America, and is now at New York.

Mr. Braham has been an especial favourite of Royalty, rank, and fashion. He lived for years at Brompton in the greatest style, and was much noticed by the late Dukes of York, Cumberland, Kent, and Sussex, the last-mentioned scion of Royalty being godfather to his son, Augustus. George III. and George IV. especially honoured Braham with marks of attention, the latter Monarch on one occasion postponing a concert at the Palace on finding that it had been fixed on the night of Braham's benefit.

Of late years Mr. Braham has only appeared from time to time at concerts. His present appearance at the London Wednesday Concerts has been prompted by the kindest feelings towards an unfortunate speculator, and not, as the public will be delighted to learn, from necessity. To be severely critical with Braham, as his sun is beginning to set, still gloriously, would be as unjust as it is absurd. We can never hope to look on his like again in the combination of the various qualities that constitute a great artist; for he has been in declamatory power and eloquence a Duprez, and in florid execution a Rubini. If Braham gave way to the ignorance of his epoch, and has sung too much to the galleries, no artist has ever sung with more refined and classic taste for the cultivated amateur He lived, like Sir Henry Bishop, in the worst days of musical acquirement, but he will leave behind him a noble standard of vocal elocution, in which he has been properly designated as the Siddons of the lyric drama. In his great days he could in his chest voice hold on the ut de poitrine as Tamburini does, and when Duprez only touched, whilst he could descend to the G in the bass. His command of the falsetto was marvellous.

To show the compass of Braham's voice, we subjoin a passage, noted by himself, from which it will be seen that he could reach the high F :-

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The first concert of the fortieth season was given on Monday night, at the Hanover-square Rooms, under the direction of Mr. Costa The two symphonies were Haydn's No. 12, and Beethoven's "Eroica;" the overtures were Mozart's "Zauberflöte," and Weber's "Preciosa." The solo instrumentalists were M. Hallé who performed Mendelssohn's pianoforte concerto in D minor, No 2; and Signor Sivori, who executed his brilliant violin fantasia on the "Lucia" themes. The vocalists were Madame Castellan, who sang a most difficult scena, by Weber, "Ho apparenta," and one by Mendelssohn, "Ah rivarsi," most artistically; and Mr. Sims Reeves, who gave, with feeling and energy, the great tenor air from Mch. la "Joseph," "Lord of my sire," and, with Mdme. Castellan, the duo from Mozart's "Don Juan," "Fog, prudes." Thus it will be perceived that the selection was unexceptionable; and the same remark may be almost applied to the execution. The "Eroica" went gloriously; even the intricate horn passages in the scherzo were heard to perfection, if not perfectly, whilst with an improvement to the composer's intention. The entire reading of this majestic symphony by the conductor was an echo of its poetic inspiration. The overtures were, of course, done to perfection. As to Hayden's symphony, amateurs of the old school, who are fond of dwelling on traditionary interpretations, objected to the velocity with which the allegretto was taken; but we know from cotheporal experience of provincial festivals, what was taken; but we know from cotheporal experience of provincial festivals, what was taken by the immortal Handel and Haydn means, being nothing more or less than a ponderous, mechanical, and dragging style of execution, devoid of all colouring and imagination, and profoundly somnierous in its effect.

Some changes have taken place in the orchestra: Pratten is the successor of Ribas, who for years has been one of the most efficient of the orchestral flautists; and violoncellist and contrabass have been reinforced by the accession of Piatti and Botticini. Sainton and Blagrove remain the violin principals, alternately.

Hallé's first appearance at these concerts has been a tardy act of justice to a pianoforte performer of classic music; better late than never, however, and his magnificent performance was enthusiastically greeted, especially in the slow movement.

The second concert will be on the 29th instant and her Majesty and Prince Albert under whose immediate patronage is the society, it is expected, will honour the performance with their presence.

CLASSICAL PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

A new work by Sterndale Bennett, one of the most distinguished pianists and composers of the age, is of such rare occurrence, that the highest interest was created at his performance, in one of the Classical Pianti, on Friday night, of his MS. Sonata D in F sharp minor for Pianoforte and Violoncello. As far as first impressions may be relied upon, the composition will fully maintain, if not raise, his previous reputation Perhaps the Rose may be found too rambling and discursive in the first and last movements; but the "Minuetto Caract-r-istique" is a gem, and amply merited its enthusiastic encore. In this sonata Mr. Bennett appears to manifest the desire to depart from conventional forms, and there are, probably, points in it which strike us more sensibly on a future hearing; the execution, it is needless to add, was perfect. Mozart's trio in E flat was played by Mr. W. S Bennett, Mr. Williams (clarionet), and Mr. Aguile (cello); and Mr. Blagrove performed the violin part in Beethoven's trio in E flat, op. 44. Mrs. Anderson and Miss Rose were the vocalists.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

The three-act opera, "L'Ath ne de la Ma aisie," produced with such success at the Brussels Grand Opera, has been brought out at the Opéra National in Paris, on the 11th inst, under the title of "Josuita." M Duprez, the once famed tenor, is the composer; M Edouard Duprez, his brother, is the author of the libretto; and Madle Caroline Duprez daughter of the singer, is the prima donna therein. MM Duprez and Poilier were the tenors, M. Balanqui the base, and Mdle Gaichard was also in the cast. "Joanita" was perfectly successful. Mdlle. Angri, Calzolari, and Lablache have appeared at the Théâtre Italien, in Rossini's "Cenerentola." Madame Viardot has returned to Paris, from Scotland, and will visit London in June. The return of the celebrated Mdlle. Darcier to the Opéra Comique, from which theatre she retired after her marriage, has been heartily welcomed by the Parisians. The Emperor of Russia has just presented to Tamburini, so many years the director of the Italian Opera in St. Petersburgh, a medal of honour in gold, encircled with diamonds, with the inscription, in Russian, "For distinction." The medal is to be worn suspended with the riband of the order of St Andrew. The deaths of Herr Winterfeldt, a well-known writer in music in Berlin, and of Joseph Drechler, the composer and chapel-master of the church of St. Stephen, at Vienna, are recorded. The Italian opera company that was recently at Brussels is now at Cologne On the 19th inst. Mdlle Wagner sang for the first time, at the Theatre Royal in Berlin; on the 25th she will be at Leipsic; and in May she is to depart for London. The Paul Government at Rome has ordered the title of Mercadante's opera, "Il Guarnacmo," to be changed to "Amore a Dovere," on the ground that the "Oath" (guarnacmo) is too sacred for an operatic work.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

The musical spectacle, "Azaïl," was revived on Wednesday night, Mr. Anderson resuming his original part of the prodigal son, and Mr. Cooper replacing Mr Vandenhoff as the father. Miss Isabella Lane, Miss H. Payne, and Mr. Harrison undertook the subsidiary portion of Asher's music remained in this version; but the real interest of the revival was centered in Madle. Vecchi, who appeared for the first time as Lia. An announcement in the bills by Mr. Bunn, that he was removed no longer to screen the artistes who broke faith with the management by refusing to perform their duty to the public, and that Mdlle. Plunkett, after accepting Lia, for original character in the Paris opera, had refused to dance, under some quibbling pretext, gave rise to the anticipation of an unrehearsed scene, but it was confined to the most tremendous reception bestowed on Mdlle. Vecchi, whose graceful dancing and expressive pantomime left no cause for regret for the absence of the danseuse of the broken contract, which is to occupy the attention of the gentlemen of the long robe, who will have to decide the knotty question whether a danseuse can be called upon to pose in costume for other words, to appear in legitimate drama, such being the grounds of Mdlle. Plunkett's flight or fancy, as well as of fact Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor" was introduced on the 13th instant, on the Drury-Lane boards, for the first time, and has since been given with great success on alternate evenings with "The Sicilian Bride" Madame Eveline Garcia has decidedly added to her reputation by her energetic and effective style of singing the music of Lucrezia. Miss P. Horton is one of the less representatives of Ormisi that has been witnessed; Mr. Drayton acts the Duke with finesse, and Mr. Wilde's Gennaro, if at times somewhat rugd and a little uncertain in the attack of the music, has some very good points. Signor Schira deserves very great credit for the careful and effective manner with which he has presented and conducts this fine opera. The encores are given to the concerted pieces of Italian version; namely, the chorus of masques in the prologue; the trio between the Duke, Gennaro, and Lucrezia in the first act; the interpolated air of Gennaro in the second act; and the celebrated Brindisi, admirably sung and well acted by Mr. Horton in the last scene. The concluding cabaletta, sung by Madame Garcia so forcibly, developes her executive powers very remarkably.

HAYMARKET.

Under the odd title of "White Magic," a two-act comic operetta was produced with complete success on Wednesday night; the libretto by H Chorley, Esq., and the music by Signor Biletta, who held the post of composer of ballet music at the Royal Italian Opera in 1847, and is known as a professor of singing in fashionable circles. It would occupy too much space to follow the plot through the different scenes of this amusing trifle, leaving the period of the "lovency." Let it suffice that the Count de Mercœur (Mr. Weiss) and Colonel Laval (Mr. Harrison) are rivals for the hand of Mdlle. Coralie de Blenchef (Rose (Miss Louisa Pyne), that they assume the disguises of fortune-tellers to achieve their ends That the Count gets the best of the Colonel in the first act; but the Colonel outwits the Count in the last act, by proving to the lady fair, who is some what of a coquette, that Le Sorcerer's effective has lost the power of its time and not for herself. The Colonel, who has been a rejected suitor in early life, and has been supposed to be dead, becomes, therefore, the eventual winner of Coralie's hand and heart. The incidents are not of sufficiently developed as they ought to be for a mixed audience, but there are some striking situations; the dialogue is lively, and the lyrics are certainly above the average order. Rose, as an attendant, is archly enacted by Miss Pyne. The same rôle affects great credit on the management, for as a young and picturesque Signor Biletta's music, as a first operatic essay, evinces considerable promise, with some positive indications of dramatic ability. The concerted pieces are individually well written, and the concerted pieces of a decided style, which is made up, in fact, of scraps from the old Italian masters, with a seasoning of the French opera comique school, ancient and modern. It was announced that Signor Biletta studied in the Conservatorio of Milan, under the modern Italian school but this is not the case; he has steered pretty clear of the Donizetti-Bellini-Verdi shools, but he has run aground on the breakers of Lully, Rameau, Grétry, and Auber, Paste lo, and Cimarosa. Signor Biletta has a fair quantity of young well, and his instrumentation displays points of elegance, in the manner use of the wood band, and its absence rarely the brass. Te rio, in "Mdlle. Coralie de Blenchef," is the best of both acts, and received the honour of a chorus Last pipe and tabor," with its double subjects, is ingenious and effective

Mr. Harrison had two ballads, "Gone are the merry days," and "Ah! since the sun began his rovings," both of which are demanded, but the encore is far to be preferred. Mr. Weiss's romance, "You are bright as the rose," is dull and meaningless; but the buffa aria, "How merry is morning," is quaint. The ballad, "The joy that sung by Miss Louisa Pyne, is a pretty; but the gem of the opera is the romance, "Oh, was I then awake or dreaming," beautifully rendered by Miss Louisa Pyne, one of the prettiest and most spontaneous of English singers in point of importance must be regarded the duet, "You trust me aside and tremble," between Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Harrison, which was excellently sung and much applauded. The dramatic pungency of the introduction must also be noticed, and the finale was admirably managed careful, zealous, and efficient, under the able direction of Mr. A. Mellon. Besides the usual compliments to the singers at the fall of the curtain, the presence of the successful composer was absolutely exacted.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE

The prospects for the season 1852 will be issued this day. It is understood, and every exertion is to be made to open the establishment in the course of the ensuing week. For the performances of the celebrated Mdle. Wagner, there will be various attractive novelties and revivals. Mdle. Cruvelli, with the laurels she has won during the present campaign in Paris, will appear in some new works, besides the opera in which she has already achieved such triumphs. The very mention of the name of Labiache will be cordially welcomed He has benefited by a long rest at his villa near Naples, and is in excellent voice. There is every hope of Madame Sontag's appearance in a new opera by Meyerbeer De Basini, the greatest baritone of the age, will make his first appearance, as also Signor Bartolini, who has been making a successful tour in Paris and Brussels. Mdlle. Lagrua, a new North German prima donna, has been secured by Mr. Lumley. Signor Gardoni will appear, and he is to be joined by Signor Mario and Tamburini. Gyllenhammer (Count Gyllenhammer) is the name of the new Swedish director Mr Harris will superintend the stage department. Messrs Rosati and Ceccli will be the principal danseuses. Ratifications of many important engagements are daily expected.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Grisi, Mario, Tagliefico, Polonini, Ronconi, Tamberlik, and Mdlle Formes, have arrived from the Continent. Mdlle Lucca and Herr Ander left Vienna for London on the 1st inst Spohr will soon quit Cassel for the country, to direct the mounting of his lyric masterpiece, "Faust," for which he has composed new music. Meyerbeer is at his villa at Naples. The Italian opera, during the winter, at Vienna, the facility with which every change of mood, sentiment, and situation is produced by this incomparable performer are indescribable. We must content ourselves with merely suggesting them. The actor and the man blend in the impersonation, and accomplish an union perfect in its elements and irresistible in its results The public and private life of the showman—his buffoonery, his domestic affections, and the hardships and the misery he has painfully overcome at all, and in all, there was the same exquisite adaptability. Again we congratulate the lyric drama profession on the advantage of having these foreign exemplars of theatrical art personally on the English stage; much may be carried from them which we should be glad to acquire.

Montemerli as primo basso cantante, with the condition that he should not refuse any other part that might be offered him, Mr. Lumley required him to sing a part in the opera of Puritani not belonging to the basso line of business, and M. Montemerli refused, on the ground that, by the usages of the profession, he was entitled first of all to make his début as a primo basso, to enable the public to be judges of his talents. In consequence of this, Mr. Lumley refused to pay his salary, or the expenses of his journey from London to Paris. M. Montemerli accordingly brought an action before the Tribunal of Commerce, and it was argued two days ago. The tribunal decided that Mr. Lumley was not justified in requiring Montemerli to sing a secondary part before he had appeared in a primo basso; as, otherwise, "the existence and reputation of an artiste would be completely at the discretion of a director," and ordered the payment of the salary due, and M. Montemerli's return from London. Montemerli is also to have an indemnity of appearing in a principal rôle. The plaintiff likewise demanded damages, but these were refused by the court.

ORPHANS' AND TRADESMEN'S BENEVOLENT PROTECTION SOCIETY.—The fifteenth annual general meeting of the members of this society was held on Monday evening, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street; Mr. Henry Kemble, president, in the chair. The report, which was adopted gave a satisfactory account of the progress of the society, since the last meeting in March, 1851. Hamilton, coffee-roaster, of Soho, had bequeathed the residue of his property (amounting to £2500 stock) to this institution. The ordinary receipts of the year had amounted to £1503 7s., being an increase of nearly £100 upon those of the last year. This had enabled the committee to admit six new pensioners on the funds, three males and three females, being the largest number admitted in any one year since 1848, and making the total number elected from the commencement 74, who had received pensions amounting in the aggregate to £7212 9s. Forty-one male and female pensioners were now living, and in receipt of pensions amounting, within a fraction, to £1000 per annum. The society now numbered 1165 members, whose aggregate votes amounted to 1630. The successful result of the last anniversary enabled the committee to increase the invested capital of the society by the purchase of £800 stock, company the sum of £14,000, Three-and-a-half per Cents, now standing in the names of the trustees, exclusive of the bequest fund.

The widows' fund is proportionate to the increase of subscribers amongst members and widows of members) to £6.8 16s. 9d., leaving a balance of £67 1s. 7d. The amount of relief distributed by the committee in four years and a half was £1005 7s. 6d. The increase in the number of subscribers during last year had rendered it necessary to reduce the allowance of most of the recipients. A sum of £548 16s. 6d. had been distributed amongst the first 84 members upon the funds, the account received from those members being only £75 13s. The report concluded by an appeal to the friends of the society for increased support. The report was adopted.

CITY OF LONDON HOSPITAL FOR DISEASES OF THE CHEST.—On Tuesday the fifth anniversary festival of this institution was held at the London Tavern; Earl Granville in the chair, supported by Sir Horace St. Paul, Bart., H. E. Gurney, Esq. (treasurer), Alderman Finnis, Dr. Jacobson (the medical officer), F. Baldwin, Esq., and about fifty other gentlemen. The meeting was, in proposing prosperity to the institution, observed, that in the year 1851 the number of deaths in the metropolis was 55 000, and of these between 18,000 and 19,000, or about one-third, were caused by consumption, or diseases of the chest, lungs, and chest. The proportion was even greater in 1847, when the influenza prevailed. Since the opening of the hospital between 10,000 and 11,000 patients had been relieved, and there were now from 150 to 170 applications daily for assistance. Last year his Royal Highness Prince Albert had laid the first stone of the hospital in Victoria-park; and the whose expense incurred for the building would be £12,000 or £13,000, of which £5500 had been paid, and there was a sum of £10,000 remaining, of which £5000 must be procured this year. The report stated that during the year 1851 there were admitted as out-patients 295 persons, and since the commencement of the year 774, making together with 1849 relieved prior to Dec 31, 1850, a total of 14,194 persons who have obtained gratuitous advice and medicine since the opening of the institution, in June, 1848. In the twelve months preceding Dec. 31, the receipts of the institution amounted to £3375 1s 9d. (of which £2778 6s. were announced at the last anniversary festival), forming, together with £4279 1s 2d. in hand at the commencement of the year, a total of £7653 8s 11d., of which £4733 9s. 9d. was expended during the year, leaving a balance of £2111 13s. 2d. to the credit of the hospital. Since that period, however, there had been paid a further sum of £2489 9s 9d; so that there now remains (exclusive of subscription not already received on account of the present year) only a balance of £121 3s. 5d. The total cost of the hospital which had been erected is estimated at £15,606 2s., of which £7 0 0 had already been paid; so that there remains a sum of £.,.,.9 3s. 4d., of which at least one-half must be expended the year. The sum collected at the dinner amounted to £3030.

LONDON PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.—The annual report of this savings bank for last year, and also of the London Life Association, which exists to have been, from 57,424 depositors, £981 312 12s. 4d.; and the payments 12 274 dep sits, £247,135 8s. 3d. The total receipts in thirty-five years have been, from 57,424 depositors, £5,247,135 8s. 3d. BENEVOLENT SOCIETY OF ST. PATRICK.—The sixty ninth anniversary of this society was celebrated on Wednesday at a public dinner at the London Tavern. His Grace the Duke of Newcastle presided. Amongst the company were the following:—The Earl of Lanesborough, the Attorney-General for Ireland, the Solicitor-General, Sir J. Reynolds, M.P., Major J. R. HUNTSWORTH-MEWS AND GEORGE-STREET, LISSON-GROVE, RAGGED SCHOOLS.—On Tuesday evening the annual meeting of the promoters of these schools was held at the Mary-stone Literary and Scientific Institution, Edward-street, Portman-square, the Hon. A. Kinnaird in the chair. From the reports it appeared that in the Huntsworth-Mews-street there were nine established schools, where afforded secular and religious education to upwards of 300 persons. The average attendance at the George-street, Lisson-grove, establishment during the winter months was about 230 scholars and 12 teachers. The daily infant school had an average attendance of 200, and the week-day evening schools were also progressing satisfactorily. In the industrial class no class for tailoring had been established at present, but arrangements had been made for commencing a class of tailors. Both reports were adopted, a vote of thanks given to the chairman and the Earl of Shaftesbury, who was present on the occasion.

While the Lord Bishop of London was engaged, on Wednesday, in the performance of the solemn rite of confirmation, at Christ Church, Newgate-street, two persons, of the names of William Amos and John Moore, well known as the leaders of the fashionable swell mob, were arrested in the metropolis, were arrested by Brett, a detective officer of the City police, who observed them put their hands several times into the ladies' pockets, but without success.

ST. THOMAS CHARTER-HOUSE CHARITIES.—The following statement on behalf of the above schools, established by the Rev. W. Rogers, Rector of St. Thomas Charter-house, has recently been made:—"Since their establishment in the year 1838, the education in the district has been steadily on the increase. The present schools were intended to contain about 300 children. The numbers now receiving instruction in them, and in a room hired on temporary, amount to nearly 800; and it is ascertained, from ordinary visit, that there are still upwards of 200 children in the district unaccommodated in provided. To remedy this evil a site has been purchased, upon which to pro ceed to erect school-rooms capable of accommodating 400 scholars. The present schools are nearly, if not quite, self-supporting, and are named in the last report of her Majesty's inspector as very remarkable instances of self-paying schools. The district is solicited, therefore, for the building fund only. The estimated cost is £2,500. With the assistance of this sum a ready one in the list, it is confidently hoped that this amount will be raised; but it cannot be denied that great exertions will be required on the part of those resident in the neighbourhood, as the inhabitants of the district are, for the most part, very poor, and totally unable to contribute an adequate sum to meet the educational wants. The object of this appeal has been promoted by the cordial concurrence and approval of the Marquis of Lansdowne, the late Lord President of her Majesty's Privy Council; the Lord Bishop of the diocese, and the most influential persons of the district in which the schools are situated."

STANDS FOR PUBLIC VEHICLES IN THE CITY.—On Saturday the resolutions adopted by the Court of Aldermen for the guidance of the drivers of public vehicles paying for hire within the boundary of the City of London were issued. The rule has permitted the erection of suitable standings for hackney and cabriolets, on which 339 vehicles will be permitted to remain for hire; they have abolished the omnibus standings in Leadenhall-street, St. Martin's-le-Grand, Fleet-street, and Cheapside, and in lieu thereof have appointed St. Paul's Churchyard and King William-street, near St. Swithin's Church, and the space between the Obelisk and Lombard-street, Gracechurch-street, and Billingsgate, opposite the Coal-exchange. No omnibus to remain more than five minutes after the arrival of the omnibus that is to follow it. Special officers will attend to the observance of the rules.

THE POOR-LAW BOARD.—On Tuesday, at the meeting of the board of directors of St. Pancras, a letter was read from Lord Courtenay, secretary of the Poor law Board, informing them of the illegality of their proceeding in removing Mr. Eaton from the mastership of the St. Pancras Workhouse, and calling upon them to reinstate him, as otherwise application would be made under the statute to the Court of Queen's Bench for a mandamus to compel their compliance. It was resolved to receive the Poor-law Board to take whatever proceedings it may be advised.

CHANCERY REFORM.—A public meeting, called by the Chancery Reform Association, was held on Wednesday at Exeter Hall; Lord Erskine in the chair. Mr. Hume, M.P., moved a resolution, declaring that, inasmuch as the Royal Commissioners appointed in 1850 to inquire into the process and system of pleading in the Court of Chancery had unanimously reported that extensive and deep-rooted mischiefs arise from the present system, involving the utter denial of justice, and the ruin of the litigants and their families, "This meeting is of opinion that no expenditure of the public money for the amendment forming the commission demands the immediate application of a legislative remedy, one of the first duties of a Government being to render justice attainable to all without delay or ruinous cost." The resolution being agreed to, Mr. Trowlawny, M.P., moved a resolution to the effect that it was most essential, in order to effectually carry out a full measure of reform, that the distinction between law and equity should be abolished—that oral examination in the presence of the Judge who tries the cause should be carried out—and that justice, in all cases, should be administered by one and the same legal jurisdiction—a practice which has been introduced into the United States with the happiest results. Mr. B. Oliveira seconded the resolution, which was unanimously agreed to. A resolution, requesting the association to continue its proceeding, having been moved and seconded by Mr. M Turner and Capt. Scobell, M.P., the meeting separated after the usual vote of thanks to the chairman.

SINGULAR ACCIDENT AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.—A few days since the whole of the ceiling of the room in Downing-street, in which the secretary for Foreign Affairs usually transacts his business, fell with a tremendous crash, covering the tables and chairs and floor of the apartment with the débris of the plaster. The accident occurred about an hour's time, and the room was consequently at the time, no person suffered any injury. An appointment with the Austrian Ambassador had been previously made by the new foreign secretary for the hour at which the accident occurred; and but a slight delay intervening on the part of the noble Earl's arrival, which postponed the interview for an hour, the fatal results to either one or both of the eminent diplomatists might have been the consequence of their meeting so soon as the time.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—The births registered in London during the last week were:—Boys, 841; girls, 805: total, 1647 children. The average number in the seven corresponding weeks of 1845-51 was 1449. The deaths for the week were 1226, exhibiting a great increase on previous weeks, and to be occasioned by the unusual coldness of the weather. In the ten weeks corresponding to last week of the years 1842-51, the average number of deaths was 1094, which, raised in proportion to the increase of population, becomes 1147. The present return, therefore, shows an amount greater than the corrected average by 95. The following table exhibits the deaths of last week at three periods of life:—

	Deaths	Average of corresponding weeks 1842-51, corrected for increase of population
From birth to 15 years	521	439
At 15 and under 60	447	383
At 60 years and upwards	274	259

By the official report it appears that 291 cases are referred to "diseases of the respiratory organs," whilst the corrected average is only 229. Bronchitis is the most conspicuous in this class, for we find pneumonia numbers 79 (less than the average), asthma 27, the first-mentioned rose to 127, greatly above the usual amount at this season. Phthisis produced an extraordinary amount of mortality: viz 182 deaths, being considerably more than the average of the preceding weeks, when they ranged only from 118 to 166. 24 children and 6 adults died from small-pox; in four cases it is stated that the patients had been vaccinated.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—At the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, the mean daily height of the barometer was above 30 in. on every day of the week, on Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday it was respectively 30.92 in., 30.395 in., 30.308 in., and it continued to fall till Friday; the mean of the week was 30.300 in. The mean daily temperature was below the average of the same day in ten years on every day except Tuesday. The mean of the week was 40 degrees, which is 1·5 deg. below the average. It was lowest on Thursday, when the highest reading was 44·4 deg., and the mean 37 8 deg., or 3·8 deg. below the average. The wind blew generally from the north-east.

THE GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS FOR ARMS.—The master gunmakers and operative fitters of Birmingham met at the Odd Fellows' Hall in that town on Tuesday, with the view, if possible, of arranging their differences with regard to the price to be paid for finishing the new Minié rifle. A long discussion took place, in the course of which both parties stated their respective cases very fully. The masters having retired, the men present unanimously resolved by the price prices sanctioned by the Board of Ordnance in 1844—being 12½ per cent. higher than they had asked for the last new line musket. Thus the matter stands, and if the contractors do not give way, it is pretty evident that the orders for 18,000 rifles must be executed elsewhere than in Birmingham.

DARTMOOR PRISON.—There are at present as many as 1200 men in these prisons, and 200 more will be ordered as soon as room can be provided for them. There is abundance of employment for the men, and they are found to contribute in good health. All the hill behind the prison has been trenched, and is now being planted with the Larch and Scotch Fir. A road has been erected in the prison, from which can be thrown liquid manure up to the top of the hill, on which will soon be covered with verdure. The experiment of growing flax has proved so completely successful that the Government intend to take in a thousand acres more for its cultivation.

SUDDEN DEATH OF A LADY.—On Wednesday afternoon, between two and three o'clock a lady of the name of Miss Mary Anne Lloyd, aged 35 years, residing at No. 4 Southampton-row, Russell-square, was preparing to dress when she complained of a pain in her side, and, on going into the garden, fell down and immediately expired.

ROBBERY OF GOLD DUST.—On Wednesday information was given to the police that a man named Peter Wills, newly arrived from California, with a large quantity of gold dust in his possession, had collected 138 ounces of gold dust, had been robbed of his treasure on Tuesday night. Wills had introduced themselves in his way, and gained his easily bestowed confidence. After separately representing themselves to him as simple people, upon whom, as on himself, fortune had smiled, and as desirous to help their fellow, and produced a roll of notes for the purpose. With strange imprudence he suffered himself to be thought of them while procuring a receipt stamp, and in a moment found himself despoiled and destitute of so much as the means of reaching his friends in North Britain.

Fifty-one tradesmen were summoned to Marlborough Police Court on Tuesday, for non-payment of their assessments. The sums varied from 25s. to £.0. Eleven, who attended, were ordered to pay in 14 days; the remaining 40, who did not attend, had warrants issued against them.

On Tuesday, Elizabeth Pinckard, who was left for execution at the late assizes for the murder of her mother in law in Newington-butts, at Daventry, underwent the sentence at the county gaol in Northampton.

The Italian, Kalabergo, who was convicted at the last Bailey sessions for the wilful murder of his uncle, a jeweller there, and whose execution is appointed to take place on Monday next, made an unsuccessful attempt on Friday week to escape from Oxford Castle, where he was confined. While his attendant was looking another way, he proceeded in scaling the wall of his prison, and had leaped on the top of another wall, but was re-taken, being unable to effect a third wall, which stil further intervened. He has since made a full confession of his guilt to a Catholic priest who waited on him, and to whom he has given permission to make the public.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

At the Court of Directors of the Bank of England, held on Thursday, for the purpose of declaring a dividend, the Governor proposed a dividend of four per cent. for the half-year, which was unanimously agreed to. The Rest will be £3,000,000 and upwards. Increased firmness in the market. Consols, which quoted on Saturday 97⅛ for Money, opened on Monday at 97⅝ for Money and 97⅞ for the account, from which they afterwards advanced to 98⅛. Increased firmness on Tuesday caused Consols to close at 98⅜, a further improvement of 98⅛ to ⅜; and on Wednesday, the upward feeling still prevailed, Consols having been 98⅜ to ⅝ after having touched 98¾. Steadiness, with a strong market, were the features of Thursday's market, and at the close of the week Consols for Money and the Account maintained the highest quotations—98⅝ and ⅞ for Money, and ⅞ to ⅝ for account, from 66 to 69. Mexican was dull; Sardinian and Venezuelan were well supported. Another rise in Buenos Ayres Stock on Wednesday advanced prices to 71 ⅛ for Deferred, and a range from 71 to 73 for account. Mexican alone was heavy. On Thursday the market was again very buoyant, and at the close of the week Buenos Ayres Bonds had further advanced 1 per cent. Spanish Five per Cents, 25¾; Passive, 5⅜; Dutch Two-and-a-half Per Cents, 63½; Portuguese Four per Cents, 34¾; Spanish Three per Cents, 42⅜; Ditto, New Three per Cents, Deferred, 19¾; Ditto, Passive, 5⅜; Ditto, Committees' Certificates, 22½; Russian, 113¾; Sardinian Five per Cents, 93¾; Belgian Four-and-a-half per Cents, 99¾; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 63½; and the Four per Cent. Certificates, 99¾.

The Railway market has been very settled, and a good business doing at improving prices. The closing rates are—

THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF MALMESBURY, SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

THE Right Hon. James Howard Harris, third Earl of Malmesbury, son of the second Earl, by Harriet Susan, daughter of Francis Bateman Dashwood, of Wellvale, Lincolnshire, was born at Spring Gardens, London, in 1807. He graduated at Oriel College, Oxford; and in 1837, as Viscount Fitz-Harris, contested Portsmouth, and was defeated by Mr. Bonham Carter, so long and so ably the leader of the Liberal party and of reform in that neighbourhood.

At the general election in the July of 1841 his Lordship was returned for Wilton, and in the following September succeeded his father in the peerage. Throughout the whole of the discussions on the changes in the tariff, in 1842, and the subsequent Free-trade measures of Sir R. Peel, Lord Malmesbury was a consistent and steady opponent of every approach to Free Trade; and since the Earl of Derby has had a seat in the Peers, Lord Malmesbury, acting as whip in the Lords, has laboured assiduously to keep the Protectionists together as a party, and especially during the last two years he has on every occasion advocated the return to that system of policy.

His Lordship is known in the literary world as editor of the diaries and correspondence of his grandfather, the first Earl who was raised to the peerage for his diplomatic services.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS. THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF MALMESBURY.—FROM A DAGUERREOTYPE BY BEARD.

His Lordship married, in 1830, Lady Emma Bennet, only daughter of Charles, fifth Earl of Tankerville.

Our Portrait is from a Daguerréotype by Beard.

MEMORIAL TO RICHARD LANDER, THE AFRICAN DISCOVERER.

A VERY interesting tribute to the memory of Richard Lander has just been completed at Truro, in Cornwall, where this amiable pioneer of African discovery was born, February 5, 1804. He died February 6, 1834, so that he was within two days of attaining his thirtieth year.

The memorial consists of a lofty column, at the top of Lemon-street. It is surmounted by an excellent portrait statue of Lander, sculptured in compact magnesian limestone, of the same quality as has been used at the new Houses of Parliament. The figure, which is ten feet in height, presents a novelty in its composition when compared with other figures in similar situations. It will be remembered that the heads of the statues of the Duke of York, Nelson, &c. are looking into vacancy. This was considered by the sculptor to be a mistake, because, if statues must be placed on columns, it is desirable that in such situations they may be seen to the best possible advantage; hence, the head of the statue of Lander is turned toward the spectators, thus affording those who knew him an opportunity of judging as to the correctness of the likeness, or otherwise; and by this means the figure has in its outline the graceful line which is so often seen in the antique statues. The statue is resting principally on the left leg, and the right arm is leaning on a small and elegantly-formed pedestal. In his right hand he holds a palm branch, which is significant not only of his peaceful mission in Africa, but also conveys an idea as to the nature of the commerce opened up by Lander with the natives, and indicates the country which was the field of his labours. The statue is in the modern costume, being arrayed in loose trowsers and a frock-coat. The above-mentioned pedestal is intended to point at once to the country where he ended his short but brilliant career. On the two sides of it that are seen are sculptured the heads of the hippopotamus (for which our old friend in the Regent's-park gave a sitting) and a crocodile, both of which animals are, or were, to be found too plentifully for poor Lander in the Niger river. This pedestal is ornamented with bulrushes, and the long leaves peculiar to the banks of tropical rivers; and around the moulding, at the base, is a wave-like ornament. Underneath the right arm of the figure, on the top of the pedestal, are three books; and falling over and hiding the front of the pedestal on which he leans is a map, on which is distinctly marked the course of the Niger, to which Lander appears to be pointing with a manuscript which he holds in his hand. The course of the Niger, here displayed, is taken from the map drawn for Wyld's great globe. The fourth side of this little pedestal is hidden by a large hat, such as is worn in countries where it is required as a protection from the sun, and a portmanteau; the artist's chief object here being to give substance, and consequently strength, to the lower part of the figure, enabling it to support the superincumbent weight.

Mr. Burnard, the sculptor of the statue, never saw Lander, but was anxious to procure as good a likeness as possible of the man; he therefore borrowed the portrait by Brockedon from the Royal Geographical Society, and called at the house of Lander's widow (now Mrs. Pask), where he saw Miss Lander, and he was so struck with the resemblance between the daughter and the father, that he at once requested her to come and sit for the bust; and thus, from the daughter and the picture, he has modelled the features. The entire height of the column and statue from the ground is 70 feet.

We add a few of the circumstances which give Lander a claim to this splendid memorial from his native town and country. In the Cornwall Gazette of December 7th, 1849, it was said that "the two main points upon which we would rest the fame of Richard Lander are, the great discovery of the outlet of the Niger into the Eastern Atlantic; and the noble conduct which he displayed when the humble and sole companion, yet faithful and confidential friend, of Captain Clapperton. The manner in which he acquitted himself at and after that lamented officer's death is beyond all praise. Left alone in the wilds of Africa, and not only friendless, but an object of suspicion to all around him, he yet managed to reach his native shores in safety, and to communicate such valuable information as entitled him to the notice of the British Government. Often renewed and fatal expeditions had for a very long period disappointed the hopes and baffled the conjectures of geographers and historians, ancient and modern; yet from time to time sufficient facts had been collected to encourage the further prosecution of an object, the importance of which, whatever time may be required to establish it fully, can scarcely be overrated.

"Such was the state of African discovery when the Government accepted the offer of Richard Lander to go, accompanied only by a younger brother, Mr. John Lander, and make one attempt more to solve the problem of past ages. These intrepid travellers succeeded in their attempt; the magnitude and importance of their success bearing no comparison with the small means by which it was most satisfactorily and conclusively achieved. Science had eventually but little to do with it; all depended upon 'determination of purpose,' that stern quality of the enterprising mind without which science is of little avail.

"Both Richard Lander and his brother on their return to England were placed in some degree of competency. But it was not enough for Richard to win the prize for which so many had in vain contended; it was his fate to join in the first attempt to turn the fortunate result of his previous travels to a mercantile account, and by so doing to join the long list of distinguished victims to the cause of Africa. In that land of populous desolation, where rest the remains of Ledyard, of Houghton, of Mungo Park, of Horneman, of Tuckey, of Pearce, of Morrison, of Clapperton, of Belzoni, and of so many other lamented travellers, there repose those also of Richard Lander. What others had in vain attempted, it had been his good fortune to accomplish; and to his well-earned fame and grateful memory it is that a Statue has been erected in his native town:—

> We pass o'er Afric's sultry clime,
> To where the Niger rolls his mighty stream,
> With doubtful current, whether bent his course
> Or to the rising, or the setting sun:
> Till one adventurous man, through perils vast
> And toil immense, hunger, and thirst, and pain,
> The question solved."
